The estate was the ancestral home of the Sala family and had been well renovated when the older of Normu's husbands brought her there to be the wife of himself and his brother. The house was one of the largest and finest occupied by laymen in any part of the country, and there were fields of barley and peas, a kitchen garden at the rear of the house, and another garden on one side, where hollyhocks and nasturtiums bloomed, and in which there was a lake with an island in its centre, surmounted by a temple overgrown with clematis. Adobe huts for the gardeners and other retainers were off near the fields, and the ponies and mules of the owners were quartered under the balcony of the mansion. Two tall prayer-poles, from which fluttered strips of butter muslin inscribed with the "Om mani padme hum," stood on each side of the main entrance, and, over the roof of the mansion, stretching from end to end, was a long string of prayer flags in the shape of squares of muslin inscribed with the same unvarying mantra. There were prayer-wheels everywhere, for the use of the household and visitors, and two of extraordinarily great size near the meadow back of the fields, one of which was turned by water and the other by some cunning machinery.

One morning early in July, at the time for the annual commercial trip to the Indian border, Normu Sala with Srong-tsan, the older of her husbands, came down from the luxurious family living rooms on the third floor of their dwelling to the large reception room on the second floor, which was also the chapel. They were both dressed for the journey, the lady wearing a robe of fine crimson wool, in place of her usual garment of silk, and high boots of the same material, encased in heelless soles of tough yak-hide. Her robe was confined at the waist by a jeweled girdle, and the clasp holding it together at the throat was of gold studded with turquoises and pearls. The charm-box suspended from a chain around her neck was faced with gold, and her braided hair, puffed at the ears, was pressed down by a broad fillet of gold with settings to match the jewels of her girdle and throat-clasp. The matron had good features, and would have appeared handsome, had it not been for the thick, dark substance with which she had besmeared her brow, cheeks, nose and chin, leaving the hollows of her eyes and her eyelids the natural color of her race.

Srong-tsan, tall, clean-shaven, and with face unstained, a rather fine looking Tibetan of forty-two years, was dressed in a silk-girdled robe and boots of dark gray cloth, and his head-covering was a high cylindrical black hat crown, nicely tacked over the centre of what resembled a gilded inverted bowl.

The husband and wife each set in motion a prayer-wheel on entering the chamber, and while Normu, muttering the sacred mantra, readjusted the silken katags on the three Buddhas in the rear, Srong-tsan took a curiously bound volume from one of the pigeon-holes which ran around the brilliantly frescoed walls and seated himself on an embroidered cushion to read.

"The trumpets of the palace!" exclaimed Normu, as a deafening blast sounded.

"His Holiness goes to Norbu-ling today," said Srong-tsan, quietly turning a leaf of his book.

Normu hurried from the room and, preceded by two of her sons, passed down the ladder, with its willow handrail, the only stairway leading to the ground floor.

It had rained during the night and the courtyard, always extremely untidy, was innocent of pavement. Mother and sons picked their way to a green mound in the flower garden and looked over the city to the procession winding down from the Potala. The Dalai Lama was going to his summer residence. In the clear air of the high altitude individuals could be distinguished, and the boys clasped their hands in front of them and bowed politely, as the yellow-robed officials emerged, one by one, from the portals. Presently, the sedan chair of His Holiness appeared and the three watchers hastened to acquire merit by each placing a little white stone on the pyramidal pile, which had already attained considerable height on the swampy ground of the garden. The morning was delightful. Doves and red-winged swallows flitted about, and even the dragon-flies, buzzing over the lake, showed their appreciation of the genial warmth. The mistress gave orders for replacing two or three prayer-flags which had been damaged by wind and rain, satisfied herself that the worsted nest woven to attract to itself all diseases coming near the house was intact, and then went to a sheltered spot under the balcony to make sure that the burning juniper twigs in their porcelain receptacle were emitting their peculiar incense, so distasteful to demons.

The juniper fire had died out, and Normu uttered a scream of terror, which brought Srong-tsan from his book and caused every human being on the premises to gather tremblingly around her.

"Droche! Lupi!" cried the master, sternly.

Droche, the maid, had lost head over the prospect of a journey, and it could be plainly seen that she had neglected to inspect the porcelain pot, as was her duty, in the early morning. A groom said that Lupi, who went on watch at midnight, was asleep; so no one could tell for how long the twigs had failed to burn. A minute, however, would have sufficed to fill the house with every fiend from the six hells.

No such calamity had ever before overtaken the Sala family, and the record of Normu's ancestors in the Chumbi Valley was equally clear.

"I knew I wasn't wrong about the colic pain that's been creeping on me the past hour," groaned an old woman who had experience with demons.

"The lotus patterns in my loom have been running to mule-ears, and the colors get mixed up in spite of me," complained another woman.

"If we get off with colic and spoilt work, I'll say it's good luck in more ways than one to be living down here in the Plain of Milk," said one of the men.

"Throw away every bit of food in the house, and let no one touch an egg that may be laid, or draw a drop of water from the well before the master and I shall have returned from our journey to the city. You who are weaving rugs stop your work, or the fabrics may turn to the cheapest rags. Pen up the swine and stable the yaks. That which we ate this morning is in us, and none can tell what evil may follow," said Normu, sadly. "Neither can we tell what spell has been laid on my sales goods, and our own wills and even the tendencies of our brutes may be defiled. Muna is exempt and Lapachan, too, through his holy office. Rugyen, in his tent on the pasture lands, and our cattlemen in their huts, may escape through the fumes of their own junipers; but I fear that what affects the rooftree will fall upon its branches."

The two sons were dispatched with a large sum of money to the temple of the chief magician to purchase powerful atoms of charm for additions to the contents of the neck-boxes which everybody wore, and Normu Sala and Srong-tsan mounted their ponies and trotted as rapidly as their consciences would permit through the streets of Lhasa, straight to the Jo-kang Cathedral.

A service was in progress and, in the din of trumpets, drums and conch shells, the shrill voices of boys could be faintly heard, as they zealously joined in the chant. Lapachan was there—the youngest of the Sala children and the little lama of the family. He smiled benignly on his mother and uncle, for Lapachan was the son of Rugyen, the younger of the two husbands.

Through to the holy of holies, bowing

FAMILY LIVING ON $500 A YEAR

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE talk on this page on June 5 has elicited a large number of responses from practical readers. A few of them are published this week, and others will follow in due course, furnishing an extremely helpful symposium. The first of our correspondents, whose letter appeals to thoughtful and frugal people, is a practising physician in a town in the Middle West.

The Doctor's Experience

"Five hundred dollars a year for a family's sustenance seems a misnomer to me when looking backward. Now I make this broad assertion: Throughout this great God's country more families make a living on $1 per day than on $2 per day. A few have $3; very few have $4; very, very few have $5.

"When I married, I married the girl I loved, and she loved me. After I paid the minister and car-fare to our home, which I had bought on time for $1,000, and we landed at home, which I had 'fixed up' myself, I had $3.12 left, and owed $988. Next day I bought two tubs and a wash board, and made a washing machine. I then had 12 cents left all right. My best girl was not strong, I was; so I did the washing and helped at the ironing of our own duds. We didn't take in washing, remember. We did have family worship every night, and grace at meals. The village where we located had an old, sixty-years-deserted church. This we were instrumental in re-establishing, and it is now flourishing. If we made 50 cents a day, we saved a very little. If $1, yet more, and so on. Let me tell you—a few old granny hens helped out when money was scarce. Bought an old cow next year, and bread and milk with corn mush and oat meal didn't cost much, but tasted good, filled the ribs out, and eased up the hens working so hard. After the second year, the Lord having been on our side, we had 'pound cake ever after.'

"We never went to bed hungry. Any couple, hitched double, pulling together, can begin life on $1 per day, save a little each day, and in a short time easily raise the living to your standard of five hundred dollars a year. Trust in God. 'Keep your powder dry,' but don't fire it away —keep it. A HARD WORKER."

A Carpenter's Income

The next letter carries us back to the fifties and tells the story of a brave young couple who lived comfortably on less than five hundred dollars a year when prices were soaring upward very much as they are soaring now. Why may we not hear from some young couples of the twentieth century as well as from their parents?

"In the spring of 1851 I was married to the lady of my choice, and in a few days we went to keeping house in a village where I worked at cabinet and joiner work for $30 a month and house rent ($5 a month). I worked eight months, then taught the village school for four months at $35 per month, and then paid the $5 per month for house rent. My year's wages came to $420. We came out $6 ahead.

"I followed that up for five years at the same rate, excepting expenses. We were $96 ahead. We then came to Michigan, and in the spring of 1856 I hired out at carpenter and joiner work, getting $1.50 per day, or $39 per month. Again I taught school four months at $35 per month. My year's wages—eight months at carpenter work and four in school—came to $452. I followed this up for five years here in Michigan, and I then owned our four-room cottage and was out of debt. The work on the house I did nights and mornings.

"After the second five years I enlisted and went into the army. We never had but one child, a daughter, so our family was small. We determined from the start to live within our means. I found that it required about all I could earn to buy food. In 1858 and 1859 flour was $12 and $14 per barrel, but we never begged or went hungry to bed. We did thank God for what we had. D. A. J."

"I cannot resist the temptation to comply with your request to tell you how I have succeeded with less than $500 a year. In 1864 everything on the market was just double the price it is now. At that time I was working for one dollar a day. I had saved a little over $100, but had no home. I formed the acquaintance of a poor girl. She dressed very plainly for good reasons, but she was exceedingly neat and tidy, which made her look pretty indeed. I was a bachelor nearly thirty, and wanted a home, and was able to secure a steady job for $365 a year.

"Before the wedding, I gave the above savings to my betrothed for her outfit. I do not remember how much she spent on herself, but she had over half left to buy furniture with. I wore the suit I had bought some time before for $38. I can get three such suits now for the amount.

"But how did we manage to succeed? Well, and pie we considered to be a luxury; coffee and were too expensive, so we used a kind of cereal at cents a pound, and at the end of two years we h little money in the bank, and the sweetest little baby in the parlor, sitting-room or dining-room, wh ever you may call it. No living young couple appreciated such a neat, humble little home more t we did. Certainly I had no time to spend in salo Instead of spending dimes and nickels wastefully saved them to keep good our membership in the chu and to give toward missionary and charitable w We have never missed the money expen in this way, and we have never beer want, although we have met with sev adversities, sickness and death. We p for our home with the money we wo have had to pay for house-rent, and I carrying a fair-sized life insurance provide for my family in case of death. The best bargain I ever made all my life was when I persuaded t poor, plain, neat little girl to become wife. She knew how to keep house on dollar per day, and save money. H. R.

Some Excellent Rules

"My first object was to get a home my own—I think money paid for re is money thrown away—a simple ho with everything necessary to do on own work in the easiest way. My ru were: Don't borrow; don't get in deb don't buy everything you see or that yo neighbor gets; do without those thin you don't really need; dress well; li well; don't waste anything; rememb there are poor children all over t world starving for that half slice dry bread or that cold potato that son would throw away.

"Learn to use the left-overs. Nev board out unless it is to help a churc dinner or something for charity. Keep strict account of all that goes out an comes in, and by all means lay by a litt every week. When my husband droppe dead suddenly, I didn't know how h funeral expenses were going to be paid A week after I didn't know where m next meal was coming from. But had a home and enough clothes. I could do anything with a needle. I kept boarders, made my own garden, abo all put my trust in God, who is always willing to help those who help themselves.

"My only outing during eight years of married life was ten days spent at the Pan-American Exposition. I was glad to get home, and my husband was only too glad to have me back. For doctor's bills and medicine I have spent a great deal. If I had that part to do over, I would put more trust in God and less money in the doctor's pocket.

"A. B."

More letters next week, mostly from women.

Dublin's International Exhibition

THE attraction of Ireland this summer, in addition to her charming scenery and unequaled green verdure, is the Exhibition at Dublin. Large numbers of people from America, Canada and England are crossing the Atlantic and St. George's Channel to visit the beautiful buildings which are crowded with artistic and industrial exhibits.

The Irish Industrial Conference held in the hall of the Royal University, Dublin, in 1903, formulated plans for the present Exhibition; men of all classes, creeds, and politics met for the purpose of deciding in what way they could better the condition of the country. It was decided to have an Exhibition in 1906, but the difficulty of obtaining a proper site led to the postponement of the project. The fund collected, representing every section of the country, soon reached the sum of £155,000 (about $750,000).

Herbert Park, just outside of Dublin, had recently been presented to the Pembroke Urban District Council by the Earl of Pembroke, one of the vice-presidents of the Exhibition. It is very beautiful, with a lake, a water fountain, and a wealth of flowers and shrubs.

The Executive Committee of the Conference selected Herbert Park as an admirable location for the Exhibition, convenient for visitors and affording a suitable setting for the magnificent structures that were to be built. The object of the Exhibition is to stimulate commercial development and promote industrial education, by inviting all nations to exhibit their products, both in the raw and finished state. The Exhibition includes iron industries, history and education, fine arts (including photography and engraving), arts and crafts, liberal arts, engineering, electricity, agriculture, sports, fishing, mining and hygiene.

The Woman's Section is interesting because of the lace industries, which have been greatly helped by the patronage of Lady Aberdeen, wife of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

The buildings are of great extent and highly ornate in design. The main entrance is at Ballsbridge, and opens into a Celtic Court; another entrance is at Donnybrook. The buildings include the Palace of Fine Arts, the Palace of Industries, a concert hall and a restaurant, besides others of lesser importance.

View of the Exposition Grounds at Dublin

The Exhibition will be of much benefit to Ireland, as the great need of the country is development of its industries and manufactures.

King Edward is coming over in July to see the Exhibition and to show his friendliness for Ireland. He will be entertained by the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire at Lissmore Castle, near Waterford.

The Irish are noted for their hospitality, and will receive with open hearts and hands all who visit the Exhibition. Those who come will see the remarkable progress that has been made in a few years—an augury of what we may expect in the near future. MARY BARTON COOKMAN.

The Snare of Avarice*

WHETHER this young man who came to Christ for instruction was really an avaricious man may well be doubted. Mark, narrating the incident, says that Jesus loved him. That Jesus should have loved any man in that special and personal manner that Mark implies is a clear indication that the man was not avaricious. It was no light thing for a man of wealth—a young man, who was already a ruler among his people—to give up all he had and become penniless, a follower of the young Galilean teacher, who was himself without a shelter for his head. The sacrifice was too great. We who know what Jesus was might make such a sacrifice to be with him continually, but this young man had only a dim perception of it. He had a high character and was seeking perfection. Christ, laying his finger on the weak place in his character, showed him the one thing he lacked. His fault was not avarice, but simply that he loved wealth better than he loved God. Not even to attain perfection would he give up his possessions.

Such love may easily become avarice. Among us there are many who have larger fortunes than they can ever use, who are still eager to gain more. There is an infatuation in this disposition. Ecclesiastes said: "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver." It is but a short step from love of one's possessions to cupidity and covetousness, and that step is often taken unconsciously. Especially to a man who has known what it is to need money, who has learned by bitter experience the sorrows and humiliations of poverty, is the opportunity of making money and hoarding it a temptation and a snare. Such a man needs to be continually on his guard lest the time come when the making of money becomes a passion with him, to which he would sacrifice honor and principle and even his eternal life.

Avarice is at the root of much of the evil of modern life. The bribes that debauch the voter and the legislator, even if they do not sometimes influence the men who are set to dispense justice, are appeals to this vice of avarice. The office-holder needs money, and the man who desires him to condone offenses or close his eyes to violations of the law knows that he wants money and uses that knowledge to compass his evil purposes. We are in danger of our constitution and our liberties being sold in this way. Should the time ever come when men learn that justice and law are of no avail against the man who has a million to spend, this republic will be near its fall. Therefore it becomes an urgent duty to impress on the young the evil of avarice.

GETTING READY

Feeding Ahead of Hot Weather

"Not quite so much meat in spring-time; use the cereals, as they heat the blood less." Seasonable advice from an old practitioner.

If one uses some care as to food, the hot weather will be passed as comfortably as any season. In fact, a person possessed of a perfectly balanced set of nerves can be happy and comfortable under most any conditions.

The truest food for building up the nervous system to a perfect condition is Grape-Nuts. The makers are skilled in their art, and knowing that nature fills the brain and nerve centres with a soft gray matter which is used up more or less each day and must be replaced, (or nervous prostration sets in), and also knowing that this gray matter is made by the combination of albumen and phosphate of potash, they select the parts of the field grains that contain the needed materials, manufacture them into a delicious food, ready cooked, predigested, and of a fascinating flavour.

The use of Grape Nuts quickly proves that it really does rebuild and strengthen the nervous system in a most certain manner. Sold by all first-class grocers and in daily use in hundreds of thousands of the best families all over the world." There's a reason." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

How God Saved Bob Williams

ON a recent evening the Bowery Mission had a visit from the Rev. Robert H. Carson, of Grace Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. Mr. Carson had a delightful time with the "boys." He recognized, from their brogue, the presence of many men from the Emerald Isle, and began his address with the declaration that he, too, was an Irishman. He soon placed himself en rapport with his audience. He spoke from the calling of Matthew from the receipt of customs, and made a powerful plea to the men to follow Christ as Matthew did.

"I want to tell you this," he said; "that no man ever followed Jesus Christ without feeling himself to be something better than he was before. What was Jerry McAuley? You know, and so do I. What was he before he began to follow Christ? What was he when he died? Was he not one of the grandest men in all the world? What was the beloved Sam Hadley before he began to follow Christ? What was he when he died? A man, lamented the whole world over."

Then came a startling and powerful reference to the man sitting by his side as leader of the meeting—Bob Williams, one of the Mission converts of fifteen months' standing.

As Mr. Carson entered the Mission that evening, his eyes fell upon a man walking down the opposite aisle of the hall towards the platform. "Who is that man?" he said. "That is Bob Williams, one of our converts, who is going to lead the meeting to-night," was the reply. The preacher placed his hand upon his brow as though he had received a sudden electric shock; then a smile, not exactly of incredulity, but of joyous wonderment, came to his eyes as he said, "Why, Bob Williams was a member of my church two years ago. He gave way to drink, and the last time I visited him he threatened to kick me down the stairs if I did not leave at once." Then there came the meeting between pastor and restored member of his flock, which those who witnessed will never forget, and side by side they proceeded in the conduct of the meeting.

On the 30th of March last, Robert Williams celebrated his first anniversary, and his testimony was as follows:

Boys, I am not going to preach a sermon, but to tell you what the devil has done for me, and what the Lord has done.

After leading a Christian life for fifteen years, I took my first drink nineteen months ago. My wife was very sick. I was attending to her for five weeks and did not go to bed nor take my clothes off during that time. On the 20th day of August I was struck down with nervous prostration, and, in an unguarded moment, I took a glass of brandy which the doctor gave me. At the time he gave me that drink I was feeding my wife with brandy and milk, and the effect of the drink I took was so strong that I took the brandy bottle and drained it. That started me off on my drunk. On the 24th day of August she died. On the 27th I buried her, and on the 30th I took my two children to the Children's Court in Brooklyn, and had them put away in an institution. I took what money I got for my furniture and from her insurance, and with that and the money I had saved, I started out on a drunk. The first place I struck was on the corner of Halsey Street, Brooklyn. I stayed there three weeks, for as soon as one bottle of whiskey was gone I had another. Then I left there and went to work again; worked a little while and then off on another spree. On the 27th of February a year ago, I started over to Brooklyn to see my children in the institution, and on the corner of Eighth Street and Third Avenue, waiting for a car, I slipped on the car track and broke my leg. I was taken up to Bellevue, and while lying there my sister-in-law got my youngest daughter out of the institution, and when she came to see me she said: "Papa, you are not doing what you promised mama to do—to be a good man and keep the home together—but here you are, lying on the verge of delirium tremens with a broken leg." She knelt by my bedside and uttered a prayer: "Blessed Saviour, save my papa and make him a good man."

Boys, that broke my heart. I promised her that as soon as I came out of the hospital I would come back to God and serve him the rest of my life. The Lord has blessed me in many ways since that time up to the present. I do not think anybody has had any fault to find with me—I have tried to do right. The Lord has reconciled me to my folks again, and I have got my children back. If they were not suffering from a severe sickness to-night, they would be over here to sing for you. I praise God for what I am. I do not look like what I was, a poor drunkard without anything to eat and no place to sleep, but, thanks be to God, I have got everything that a man wants, and all that I ask is, that some of you men will come and taste and see how good the Lord is. I tell you it is a blessed way to live. I have found it out. And what the Lord has done for me he will do for any man here who will come and give his heart to God, and I pray that some of you will come to-night.

At the Gate of the Bowery Mission

Brother Williams came to the Mission on a pair of crutches, his leg still in a plaster cast. Our president, Dr. Klopsch, being present at one of our meetings shortly after, I took him into the kitchen to see Williams, as an illustration of the many men who are turned out of the hospitals because of their over-crowded condition, long before they are fit to do any work. Dr. Klopsch spoke words of kindness and encouragement to him, which he regards as one of the greatest helps to him at that particular crisis in his life. The Mission cared for him for several months while his leg was mending, and when fit for work found him another position. He has steadily grown in his spiritual life and is regularly to be found, either on the Mission platform or in some other mission, telling the wonderful story of "How God Saved Bob Williams."

Answered Prayers

B. S. H. "I am glad to acknowledge in your good paper, which is so welcome in our home, that I know the dear Lord does hear and answer prayer."

Mrs. E. W., Indiana. "I have derived much help from the 'Answered Prayers' column. God has heard me in my distress many times and answered my prayers."

Miss E. C. N., Minnesota. "Some years ago I was sick. I prayed God for help, and my prayer was answered. In times of trouble the Lord has mercifully helped. Praised be his name!"

Escondido, Calif. "I praise the Father who provides for his children's needs. Many blessings have come to me and mine through answer to prayer. Your department is a great help to its readers."

A Reader, Ohio. "I know God answers our prayers for even little things, and how comforting is the thought! I thank God for the promise that whatsoever we ask the Father in Jesus' name he will give us."

L. A. Q., New York. "I was ill for more than a year, but I did not cease to pray that if it was the Lord's will I might recover. By a seeming miracle I am healed of my affliction. Praise God for his mercy to the children of men."

F. P. C. "I love to read your 'Answered Prayers' column, but I would as soon think of attempting to number the stars in the heavens as to enumerate the answers to prayers I have had in my fifty years' walk with God. Believe and receive go hand in hand in my experience."

C. E. F., Ohio. "I always look for the 'Answered Prayers' first, for they give me strength and grace for the day. May God wonderfully bless those good souls that acknowledge him. I, for another, know that God answers prayer many times in a surprising and marvelous way."

Devoted Reader, Ontario. "I want to let the world know how gracious the Lord has been to me in answering prayer. I was suffering excruciating pain and I prayed earnestly for the pain to cease and God answered my prayer by removing the cause of the pain. Praise his name for his goodness to me; I can trust him for my future."

THE DEACON'S VIEW

By W. C. Martin

ID Deacon Good, "I pity those with less than half a score!
, we brought up some fourteen, and re wished for several more.
only had six children we could call our ery own, couldn't think of raising half-a-dozen all alone.

e never stole a child yet, and hope I never may," he, "but if I couldn't get them in an onest way, ow I would be tempted to resort to shady tricks;
what would home have been to us with only five or six?

begged a few and borrowed some,
and some just drifted in;
w of them, folks told us, were just soaked and steeped in sin; never found them so) and some were orphans, just bereft arents, and we always took what other people left.

e never had the 'ong-we,' and we never got the blues;
never went around proclaiming pessimistic views.
farmhouse rang with laughter, and throughout the livelong day, re was always something doing that would keep the blues away.

"nd now our hearts are still kept young," said he, "with countless joys, letters come by almost every mail from those dear boys girls, who now have gone to hustle for themselves and do t of good in this old world, and raise big families, too.

"nd back they come to visit us, like angels from above;
ir arms are full of babies and their hearts are full of love.
ant to go to heaven when I change my local sphere,
a home with lots of children makes it awful pleasant here."

VHAT a wonderful compendium of all law are these ten brief commandments! To the millions of rly emancipated slaves brought suddenly of bondage and set free in the desert, w strange they must have sounded! If y man in the vast assemblage cherished idea that, now he was out of reach of overseer's whip and beyond the sound his voice, he might live as he chose, how se sharp clear commands must have un-ceived him! They were the beginning of tional life, the foundation of a constitu-n, the first rough bonds of morality. her legislation would be needed, but se ten laws were enough for a begin-g. They meant more than appeared on surface, but even so, they sufficed for living of a clean moral life. No tion could be called barbarous that had s code alone on its statute books. First of all they must know their divine ler. Many of them doubtless had been azed at what had occurred, and blindly llowed Moses. Now they must know d. "I am the Lord who has brought ee out . . . thou shalt have no other ds before me." They are not told that ere are no other gods, but there are to be other gods for them. We know how ey went seeking others, eager to render mage to any blind deity they could find, d we wonder at them. Men are not so ger now to seek a god; rather they are xious to ignore God altogether. But ere are still gods many who have their any worshipers. Money, position, power, easure, lust—all these have their slaves whom God thunders, "Thou shalt have other gods before me."

Secondly, they are not to make any nage of their God. He is to be so holy, sacred to them that they must not even y to represent him. We know how the ople transgressed with the golden calf, d we are surprised. Yet even now, there e no cities in which there is no crucifix, d scarcely an art gallery in which God is not represented in some master's work.

Thirdly, God's name is to be held sacred. It is not to be lightly or frivolously spoken. Men, and even women, pay little regard even now to the prohibition. On the streets, in the markets, everywhere the holy name is profaned by careless lips.

And fourthly, God's day is to be observed. A weekly reminder of him is given in the day of rest, the greatest boon that could have been given to this weary world. Thus God joins blessing with obedience, and in serving him we gain good to ourselves. It will be a grievous and a wicked thing if we, as a people, degrade and debase his gift.

American Girls Abroad

WITH the coming of the wistaria and the nightingales, the tourists make their appearance in Constantinople. Many Americans and a few English come to Scutari to see the American College for Girls. These travelers are generally surprised to find them in dress and appearance very much like American girls. One lady stepped up before a tall girl and said, "Why, you would never know she was Oriental. Does she speak English?" She was somewhat confused to learn that she was a Boston girl spending a year in the college. As all the students understand English perfectly, they are often entertained by the naive comments. One New Yorker, after visiting a Greek class, was overcome by the thought that she was among the descendants of the Hellenes, and joyfully asked concerning the professor, "Is he really a modern Greek?" to receive the laughing answer that "he was not an ancient Greek."

Miss Helen Gould visited the city in May last and spent one Sunday at the American College. She attended the morning service, visited some Bible classes, and saw a good deal of the girls, finally becoming an honorary member of one of the classes. Hester D. Jenkins.

Music at the Seattle Convention

One of the great attractions of the Christian Endeavor Convention at Seattle, Wash., July 11-15, will be the elaborate musical programme prepared by the committee in charge. A chorus of 1,500 voices, the largest ever brought together in the Pacific Northwest, will assist soloists of national reputation in the singing of Handel's Messiah.

The chorus, with an orchestra of 150 pieces, has been rehearsing for the past four months under the direction of James Hamilton Howe. The work is almost completed and critics who have heard the music declare that the work of the singers is equal to that of any chorus of its size ever brought together.

The oratorio will be sung on the evening of July 9, and will be produced in Fillis-ton Tent, one of the large tents obtained by the Committee of 1907, to be used as an auditorium. Space will be provided for the seating of 7,000 visitors under the big canvas.

New York's Child Labor Law

Governor Hughes of New York has signed the bill which recently passed the Legislature, and which limits the hours of labor of children under sixteen in factories to eight hours a day, six days in the week, and of males under eighteen years to six days of sixty hours in any week, and to ten hours a day. It also prohibits work by minors between midnight and 4 A.M., and restricts the hours of labor of females under twenty-one years old to ten hours a day, between 6 o'clock in the morning and 9 o'clock in the evening.

Not Joshua

A mountaineer of one of the back counties of North Carolina was arraigned with several others for illicit distilling. "Defendant," asked the court, "what is your name?"

"Joshua," was the reply.

"Are you the man who made the sun stand still?"

Quick as a flash came the answer: "No, sir: I am the man who made the moonshine."

I am now, more than ever, convinced that by offering the Basket Washer at $3.50 I am making washday one of the easiest days of the week for thousands of women, whereas it was the hardest and most dreaded.
There was never any doubt in my mind of how well the Washer would do its work, but I hardly expected each day's mail to bring me from one to a dozen of the strongest letters of commendation.
It matters little in what part of the country you live, I have very likely a letter endorsing the Washer from some one near you, or in your own town.
The Basket Washer will positively wash a tub of clothes in six minutes. Some purchasers say they can even beat that record. But that time is short enough.
Imlay City, Mich., April 29, 1907
Dear Sir: Received your Basket Washer some time ago, but have been very sick for over a month. In fact I am still under the doctor's care. Would say we didn't think very much of it at first, but as the proof of the pudding is in the eating, I found out differently. We can scarcely say enough for it now. Garments that were old and stained came out clean and white without any extra labor. Thank you very much. Mrs. Ida Stoner.
Dayton, O., May 9, 1907
Dear Sir: I received the Washer all right, and we tried it this morning and think it fine and so easy and simple to use. I shall recommend it to my friends and thank you very much for inventing such a lovely little Washer.

Sir: I received your machine some time ago and am well satisfied with it. Have used it both with hard and soft water, and I think it ought to be called "The perfect machine." Yours truly, Mrs. Wm. Sage.
I can't send the Washer on trial, the low price prohibiting, but I'll return your money absolutely if you're not satisfied.

This is the Basket Washing Machine I have told you so much about, which I am selling at $3.50.

low as the great curtain of linked horse bits was solemnly lifted for their accommodation, passed the rich layman and his wife. In the presence of the Jo itself, the beautiful statue of the youthful Gautama, they paid to the chief lama the fee for the privilege of relighting their juniper twigs, and were permitted to purchase, also, a spark of the most sacred of fires by lighting, from one of the golden butter lamps burning on the altar, a wick which they had brought with them in a small vessel filled with butter.

In addition to the fees charged, the lady drew forth a necklace of turquoises and pearls sprinkled with coral, the most costly of her jewels, and the chief lama hung it around the neck of the Buddha, while Srong-tsan placed a gold eating bowl among the gifts before the altar.

The couple next rode to the most unsightly quarter of the city, the locality in which dwell the Ragyabas, whose profession it is to dispose of the dead. Some member of the party might die on the trip to the borderland, as a result of the ascendancy of the demons, and, though the unfortunate one be the lowliest menial, his remains must be religiously cared for. The ponies stood ankle deep in the black mud in front of a wretched horn hut, while their riders hired two of the scantily clad, repulsive looking Ragyabas to accompany them on the journey. Vultures, dogs and sleek swine, whose pigships would soon be dainty morsels for even the lamas themselves, were swarming around, for a dead body lay on the ceremonial stone. A lama had made the usual hole in the top of the skull for the escape of the soul, and he stood looking on, with two or three of the relatives, as a Ragyaba hacked the body to pieces, throwing the flesh to the creatures to whom the deceased, in his lifetime, had piously willed it, and giving the bones to an assistant to be reduced to powder.

If An Advertisement Convinces You, Stay Convinced

When you read in this magazine the advertisement of a manufacturer who has paid for the space used, to convince you that it is to your interest to buy his goods, and you go to a dealer where such articles are usually handled for sale, do not let the dealer or one of his clerks sell you something else which he claims is "just as good." If an advertisement convinced you, it was because of the element of truth which it contained. We accept only such advertisements as we believe truthfully describe the goods for sale.

GOD'S CLAIM ON MEN

By Mrs. M. Baxter

CONSTRAINT awakens opposition in the natural heart. When we say to a child, "You must do this or that," the desire to do the contrary is aroused. But the New Testament or covenant which God makes with his people in Christ is not written on tables of stone, cold and hard like the old law, but "with the Spirit of the living God . . . in fleshly tables of the heart" (II. Cor. 3 : 3); it is not a stern command addressed to us from without; God says: "I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people" (Heb. 8: 10). That which is written in our hearts, we do, not by constraint and unwillingly; it becomes our life to do it, and we can say with our Lord, "I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart" (Ps. 40: 8). The law said to us, "Thou must," and the reply of many a heart has been, "I neither will nor can." The new covenant calls upon us, and then enables us to abandon ourselves, our life, our will, our powers; to take the place of condemned and crucified with Christ, that he may come in and live in us and through us a life which is perfectly pleasing in God's sight; and our hearts says, "I can . . . through Christ which strengtheneth me."

When God gave the law from Mount Sinai, everything in the surroundings was calculated to inspire terror. "There were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all the people that was in the camp trembled" (Ex. 19: 16). Then the people were brought near, but might not come up into the mount; they were obliged to keep at a distance from God; "lest the Lord break forth upon them" (19: 22-24). When Moses recounted to the people, after their forty years' wandering in the wilderness, the circumstances of God's giving of the law, he said, "The Lord talked with you face to face, out of the midst of the fire (I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to show you the word of the Lord; for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount") (Deut. v. 4, 5.) What a contrast is Heb. 12: 22-24.

The commandments of the first table contain God's just claim upon man in his relations to himself. "I am the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Fact and experience were God's warrant in asserting his claim. As thy God, I have a right to thy adoration and thy love, but still more, "I have redeemed thee from bondage, I have been true to thee; now be thou true to me; give me my true place in thy affections, in thy desires, in thy service, in thy very thoughts; let neither person nor thing be before me; let thy God be first." Now, have we who are believers kept this law? We, too, have been delivered from slavery—he delivered us; we are made free from sin—he made us free; we owe all and everything to him, and we must love him; our hearts are drawn out to him, and the law of love which is written there sees him as its first object. But if we are not made free, we cannot love; something else is taking the central place in our hearts, and no compulsion that we can exercise upon ourselves will produce love to God until our hearts are given up to him, and by him made free.

The second commandment is directed against the strong tendency to idolatry which exists in every human heart. All the heathen have made likenesses or images of their gods, after their own conception, and have worshiped them, "even the work of their own hands." It is strange that the utter senselessness of idolatry has not struck its votaries.

The Great Hereafter

From THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States:

"I shall read THE GREAT HEREAFTER with deep interest. I have looked over it enough to be able to tell something of its value, and it has to me the added value of knowing the life, and the strife after right, of the man who wrote it."

I believe the saints will differ in Heaven in the glorified bodies which their souls will wear, and that the characters which they make on earth will determine their eternal bodies.

REV. MADISON C. PETERS, D.D.

From GROVER CLEVELAND,
Ex-President of the United States:

"THE GREAT HEREAFTER will not o have a place in my library, but will often be fou in my hands, as a source of reinforcement of fai exceedingly opportune in these days of loose thinki and careless teaching."

'Tis not a Silent Land!
Tones of harmonic spheres,
Heard not by mortal ears,
Thither their echoes roll
Into the answering soul;
Oh! 'tis a Voiceful Land!

Glimpses of the Coming World

Did He See Heaven?

IT is not often that the daily press contains sensational articles about the life hereafter, but a few days ago the newspapers related at considerable length the story of a priest, apparently in good health, who had a vision of heaven, and who died suddenly the following day.

The Other Side of Death

Such visions are not so rare as the prominence given to this occurrence would lead one to suppose. If all the exalted thoughts, the beatific insights and the death-bed glories could be gathered together, they would fill, not merely whole volumes but entire libraries.

There has been needed a book that should clarify the misty and often unhealthy notions that largely prevail in regard to the state of the righteous dead, a book not made up of the crude ideas of ignorant and superstitious people, but of the views of scholars and of the highest type of Christians.

The Great Hereafter

Such a book has indeed made its appearance. It is entitled The Great Hereafter, and is from the pen of the Rev. Madison C. Peters, D.D., the late pastor of the Bloomingdale Church, in New York City. Whether Dr. Peters has looked into heaven with his own eyes we know not, but in this substantial and handsome volume he sees, and makes his readers see, the beauties of the Cloudless Land.

It was a stupendous undertaking to bring together in one volume the views of more than four hundred of the world's greatest thinkers upon the questions of the immortality of the soul and the Great Hereafter, but Dr. Peters possesses unusual qualifications for the task. A ripe scholar, a sympathetic pastor and preacher, and an author of other works akin to the matter of this book, he has brought to bear upon his subject rare powers of heart and mind

Is Heaven a City or a Country?

Some people picture Heaven as a beautiful country, with rolling hills, winding streams, orchards of luscious fruit and meadows of living green. With others, it is a city of everlasting foundations, jasper walls and golden streets. The author of The Great Hereafter shows how these opposite conceptions may be harmonized.

The Occupations of the Blessed

"Is there any one who can carry his present employment into Heaven?" inquires a writer in a recent periodical. "The lawyer cannot, there will be no quarrels; the doctor cannot, there will be no sick; the preacher cannot, there will be no sinners." Dr. Peters explodes some false views of the subject, and gives some hints in regard to the nature of the employment in the better country.

Our Friends in the Sorrowless Land

It is a book for everybody because everybody is interested in the themes discussed. Such questions as these continually rise to our lips: Where are our dead? Shall we know our friends in heaven? What is the occupation of our loved ones in the life beyond? Do they know what is going on in this world? Can they communicate with us? Is Spiritualism a safe guide? What is the state of the soul between death and the resurrection? Are there degrees of happiness and glory in heaven? What is the nature of the resurrection body? What do the dying often see?

The Testimony of Great Men

These fascinating but difficult questions the author has undertaken to answer. He has ransacked the great libraries and questioned the master spirits of humanity, until he has knit together in one compact volume the best the world has to say upon these great themes. From Socrates to Spurgeon, from pagan philosophers to Christian preachers, the long procession moves on, each distinguished witness asserting his belief in the Great Beyond.

Shall We Wear Mourning

The chapter on funeral customs is replete with interest. It is a collection of curious facts in connection with the burial of friends. Many good Christian people will be surprised to learn that the use of crape is a heathen custom, and not in harmony with the belief in the believers' victory over death. The author shows the marked changes which Christianity has made in funeral rites, but there are yet some needed reforms. The reader is exhorted to do away several silly social customs.

An Immortal Book

In an age of such an enormous output by the press when the most popular book of a year is soon buried under fresher covers, it is hardly safe to predict the immortality of any work. But it is surely not too much to say, that as long as there are human griefs to be assuaged and human longings for another life, this noble book, The Great Hereafter, must find a place.

It is published by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is fine illustrated, and is bound in several attractive styles.

THE GREAT HEREAFTER is a Magnificent Volume, consisting of 600 Large Pages, measuring 8 by 10 Inches, Beautifully Printed on very Heavy Paper, with Wide Margins, from Very Large, Clear Type, and exquisitely bound in Cloth, Half-Leather, and Full Morocco. Skilful Indian Carpenters

A Street in Lahore

A Native Merry-go-round

IN THE CITY OF DISCONTENT

BY CHARLES M. PEPPER

DISCONTENT and unrest in India are not uncommon; but the present agitation is said to give the British officials grave anxiety because in the north it is centred at Lahore. Lahore s one of the most interesting cities in India, not so ch on account of its temples and mosques and other morials, as because the Mohammedans, the Hindus the Sikhs are all represented there, and the unrest is l to pervade all of them, ead of being confined to ngle sect.

Lahore is also interesting ause it is what might be ed the educational centre orthern India. There are ost as many printing-sses as in Bombay, and ny newspapers are pub-ed in the vernacular lan-ages. Some of the news-pers, though edited by na-es, are also published in glish.

Among the educational in-utions are the Punjab Uni-sity College, the Lahore vernment College, the Ori-tal College, the High hool, the Government and ssion Schools. There is o Lawrence Hall and the ayo Hospital, monuments progressive Englishmen o did much to improve the lfare of the native races.

I don't think there is any rt of India where so large proportion of the natives eak English as in Lahore. ey have availed them-lves of the schools and lleges and many of them e very apt. I had a unshi or teacher in Bombay to give me some lessons Hindustani. He was a graduate of the Lahore hools and colleges, and belonged to a family of pun-ts who had been famous as teachers for many genera-ons. He was familiar with Persian, Arabic, Sanscrit, d several native languages, and knew a little Ger-n and French; but his distinction was his knowledge English, which he spoke and wrote as well as a aduate of Oxford or Cambridge. He had taken a scholarship in one of the English universities, and is there now completing his education. Later, he will return to India.

In the mingling of Mohammedans, Hindus and Sikhs, Lahore any day of the year presents a very vivid and natural picture of Indian life. The history of the city is also very interesting. It is supposed to have been founded in the second century of the Christian era, and was the centre of the aristocratic Rajput race which, through many centuries, was the ruling race of India. Later, when the Mohammedan conquerors came, they made it the seat of the Moghul dynasties.

The Famous "Golden Mosque" at Lahore

While there is much Hindu carving on the buildings and temples, the architecture of the city is chiefly Mohammedan. There are many projecting galleries and balconies of lattice and other carved woodwork. The manual arts, especially wood-carving, are to-day a pleasing feature of the local industries. A Lahore carpenter is really an artist in woodwork. Some of the doors that were carved in the time of the Emperor Akbar are fine specimens of this art. They are preserved in the Punjab Museum, which is one of the finest in India.

Among the many historic monuments of Lahore is the mausoleum of Jehangir, the Moghul ruler who styled himself "Conqueror of the World." That inscription can be deciphered on his magnificent tomb, but the world he conquered was not a very large one, nor was its conquest very complete or enduring.

A more impressive tomb in the memories it rouses, though not as to the structure, is that of Anarkali, which is a marble casket. Anarkali was a slave girl, very beautiful, who was said to have smiled at Jehangir when he was a youth, thereby bringing down on herself the displeasure of Akbar, his father, who caused her to be buried alive — an awful price to pay for a smile! But these inhuman punishments were not uncommon under Moghul rulers in the seventeenth century.

Lahore and the surrounding country in the early part of the nineteenth century were under the dominion of a famous native ruler, Ranjit Singh, who was known as the "Lion of Lahore." He was a fierce warrior and conquered much of the surrounding country, and though his rule was despotic and he was guilty of many atrocities, he carried out an enlightened policy for the improvement of the whole region. When he was not at war, he was engaged in public works. He left many memorials, but his real monument is perhaps the terror in which his name is still held. His descendants have become pensioners of the British government, which did not admit their claims to continuing in authority.

THE COMING DAWN

TEXT: Psalm 30:5
"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

THE Bible declares that it is better to go to the house of mourning than to join in the frolics of the merrymakers. But that does not mean that we should talk to those in trouble with the lugubrious and sepulchral countenance of an undertaker officiating at a funeral. If there is any time in life when we need the curtain up and the sunlight flooding every room in the house, it is when the dark clouds of bereavement have showered the hearthstone of the home with bitter, scalding tears. If there is ever a time when a visitor should enter a room with a smile upon the lip, and with a ringing note of joy in his salutation, and with hope and peace and comfort radiating from every feature of his countenance, that time is when he is standing by a sick-bed, or is extending the warm clasp of affection to one who is bowed under the heavy burdens of grief. Yet the strange fact is that not one in fifty knows how to enter the house of mourning. Instead of going there with a message of comfort and peace and hope, the average man entering the house of trouble depresses the barometer of suffering, and makes the gloomy days of trouble still more gloomy.

Miserable Comforters

Almost all of us hold in memory the recollection of the agonizing visits which some weeping Jeremiahs made to us when our cup of anguish was filled to the brim and overflowing. They came to us with long tales of woe to tell us that if we had only gone to their physician, and used his medicines, our baby would not have died. Or they came to tell us that perhaps God took away our dear ones because we were not living close enough to him, and had not fully consecrated our lives to his service. Or they came to us and said: "My dear friend, you should thank God that he has taken away your boy, because your child might have lived to grow up a very bad man, to be some day executed for the crime of murder; or he might have become a drunkard, a libertine, or a thief.

Or they entered our sick-rooms and homes of death as the miserable comforters of Job came to the patriarch after he had lost money, children, and health. Those men had the idea that heavy trouble was the result of heinous sin. They believed that God punished a man in this way when he had done wrong. So when they saw Job suffering the loss of property, and children, and health, they concluded that he had committed some serious crime. They hinted their belief to him, and urged him to repent and confess; and when the poor, harassed man insisted that he was innocent, they warned him not to make his case worse by hypocrisy.

But though the world may have its Eliphazes and Zophars and Bildads, thank God that the human race also has its Davids! It has the noble men and women who, in times of great trouble, can come into our lives and speak the sympathetic word in just the right way. These men may have a tear in the eye, but they always have a smile beaming on the lip. They come to us in our distress and say, "Brother, it may be dark for you now, but believe me, God is good. From my own personal experience I can testify that all things will come out right, if we only trust him and live for him. 'Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.' Thank God, the sunrise of Gospel truth can always follow the darkest nights of despair."

David's Testimony

David could speak from experience about nights of weeping. He was no novice in sorrow. He had tasted the bitter cup of woe and had drunk its contents to the dregs. And as I portray the sufferings of the shepherd boy who afterwards became the king of Israel, I want his experience to help you to find the peace that passeth all understanding which the sweet singer of Israel enjoyed.

David, in the first place, knew all about the mental sufferings of an unhappy child. He knew what it was to have a little boy's heart beat and throb with anguish. He knew what it was to go sobbing night after night to bed. He may have known what it was to crave for parental love and receive it not. And of all a child's troubles, I believe there is not one greater than to feel that the father and mother love the rest of the children better than they love him. Oh, the awful sufferings that come from parental favoritism! God pity the boys or the girls who have to bear that heavy trial in their youth.

Parental Partiality

Where do I find the intimation that David had an unhappy childhood? I think we have it in the story of Samuel's visit. Have you ever carefully studied that incident? Why, parental favoritism is sticking out all over it. When Samuel came to Bethlehem to find a new king of Israel among Jesse's sons, what did the father do? He brought every son he had before the prophet, except one. He seemed to say, "Samuel, here are my seven boys. Did you ever see a finer lot of young men? Any one of them is fit to be a king." And as the father speaks thus a look of loving pride spreads over his features. But the prophet is still not satisfied. He keeps looking and looking. He is looking for some one else. Then he says to Jesse, "Are here all thy children?" With that a look of disdain comes into the father's face as he answers, "Ah, yes; there is still another; but he is a puny, undersized stripling. He does not amount to much; you surely do not want him. There yet remaineth the youngest, and behold, he keepeth the sheep." Thus as Jesse pushed David his son into the background on account of parental favoritism for the other children, some of us have lived through a bitter childhood. We have angrily felt that our father or mother did not care for us as they cared for the rest. David well knew what it was to weep during the long nights of his childhood. And yet to-day he comes to all boys and says, "My young friends, do not worry. God will yet scatter your gloom. There is a bright dawn coming for you. Look how God has led me out of my childhood trials. 'Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.' Boys and girls! Young men and young women, with your fresh young cheeks wet with a shower of tears, will you believe it?"

But David had more dark nights than those found in his childhood time. He also knew what the struggles of young manhood mean. He knew what it was to work for years to perfect himself for an important task and then to be laughed and sneered at and denied opportunity to do what he knew he was fitted to do. He was just like hundreds and thousands of young people adrift in our large cities, struggling to get a foothold in life when the world will not recognize their physical and mental capabilities.

A Brother's Sneers

Read the story of his offer to fight the giant. What do you now find? Young David is in the camp of King Saul. Before him stalks the great Goliath, defying the armies of Israel. What did David do? Why, he said, "If no one else will go forth to meet this giant, I will go." Had he not earned the right to go? Was he not one of the keenest, if not the most expert marksman with the sling in all the Hebrew nation? Had not his bravery been tested again and again? Alone with the sheep, 'way off among the foothills, had he not defied the wild beasts and the Bedouin robbers? And yet, when young David said, "I will go and fight the mighty Goliath," what happened? His older brothers, who were honored soldiers of Saul's army, began to sneer and to laugh. "Aha!" they said, "you had better go home and hang on to your mother's apronstrings! You are a pretty-faced baby to come here and talk like a braggart!" Listen; let me read you the literal words: "And Eliab's anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither? and with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness? I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thy heart; for thou art come down that thou mightest see the battle." Thus young David had to struggle to get his foothold in life. Has not King David a right to come to our young folks, battling and struggling to get a foothold in life, and say, "Young people, I know your trials. I know how hard it is to make the world recognize your powers. But struggle on. God will see you through. darkness and despair are sure to be followed sunrise of triumph. Weeping may endure for but joy cometh in the morning. Yes, young fo on in your struggles; all will yet be well."

But to-day David comes to bring us Gospel which he has found in the crises of maturity a in the trials and misrepresentations and of his early life. When David was a matu developed man, with the kingly crown upon and the royal purple robes about his shoulders a Goliath to fight more formidable than the encountered when he was a rugged-faced sheph And when David met this second Goliath he not the conqueror but the conquered. And yet as a repentant libertine and murderer, he com and says: "Friend, your earthly success may ha the means of destroying your spiritual life. Bu can save you yet, for he has saved me, the sinners." Has your experience, successful ma that of King David? Have you never shed repenta over some spiritual fall, some mean, disgraceft you have done under strong temptation?

A Pictorial Contrast

The material conflicts of a noble youth ca compared to the spiritual struggles of the huma when facing some terrible sin of middle life. Son ago I saw in the home of one of my elders a m gestive picture. Its subject was "Darkness and I In the foreground of that picture is the bright su of the noontide. A young woman, with a baby arms and a sturdy child of five summers tugging skirts, has brought a well-filled lunch basket young husband working as a day laborer. H magnificent specimen of a man. With his abou health and laughing face he seems to say, "Lif battle, but my bare arm is strong enough to figh Life may be a struggle, but if triumphant joy wa pictured in a man's face, it is to be found in th ground of that picture.

But hardly has your eye studied the four figures in the foreground than you look int background of the picture. There under the shadow in a beautiful garden stands a young wom widow's weeds. She has an open book in her which she is listlessly carrying. She has been ing, but her mind is far away with the dead. denly she turns and catches a glimpse of that family group. If her sad, mournful eyes and pa face mean anything they seem to say, "Oh, if I only give up my money and my home, and my diam and my wealth, and have my dear ones to love that! O God, can I ever be as I once was? So of us seem to be walking amid the gardens o temporal prosperities. But we are not studying pictures upon our walls, or the grandeur of our h We are looking at the spiritual wrecks of our past

The Old Man's Experience

But David comes in his old age, as a broken-he father, to bring to us Gospel comfort, just as he came as a young man and as a middle-aged man. comes with his gray hairs and with tottering feet leaning upon a staff, and says, "Fathers and moth know only too well how you are worrying and ag ing over that wayward boy. I have drunk out of same chalice of woe. I know what it is to sit up night after night, waiting for him to come home, while listen for his staggering footsteps. Ah, no night dark as that night when a loving parent is listening the step of a returning prodigal. I have been thr it all. God will comfort you, even as he co forted me after my boy Absalom went astray. him, father. Trust him, mother. He is the Jesus alone can bring you comfort at a time like this. you trust him, you who have dear ones who are d wrong? Will you trust this Christ even now? you just trust Jesus and cling to him for help?"

BUSINESS WOMEN ORGANIZE

A Professional Co-operative Movement in New York City and its Philanthropic Object

ONG the many organizations which permeate our present day civilization, it must have been noted by the "attic philosophers" who study of social conditions that the ional business woman has hitherto neglected organized association with her kind.

Miss Mary B. Cleveland

As far back as 1889, Chicago awoke to the great need which existed for the protection of the young business woman from the frequently unscrupulous methods, and always excessive fees, of employment agencies. It is not at all uncommon—in fact, it is usual—for such agencies to exact a considerable enrolment fee, and, if the applicant secures employment, to collect from her the first week's entire salary. And this when the woman who s for the position, such as manager, general literary r, stenographer, bookkeeper, typist, cashier, secre- or any one of e many kinds of al and general clerks, is least l—at the begin- of a long sought nagement—to e the demand up- r slender purse. large number of uiness men of hago heartily en- sd the movement toon came to de- solely upon it heir women em- ees.

a natural result ese methods, the loyment depart- handles from to 300 desirable ions per month, it is the pride of nanagement that ty per cent. of e calls are satis- rily filled.

s an outgrowth of the small beginning of eighteen s ago, the Chicago exchange is at present composed our large departments, occupying two floors of a ninent building in the centre of the city's business section. It has installed a training department, or preparatory business school, the incentive for the establishment of which was given by the demand for expert stenographers of good general education and alertness of mind, capable of grasping complicated commercial details and accepting responsibility when necessary. The course of study includes short-hand, typewriting, filing and other branches germane to those already enumerated, taught by skilled specialists. The working plan of this department is exactly in reverse order from that of the business college, which engages to secure employment for its graduates, while the exchange has the employer's application awaiting the competent graduate.

A high-grade business woman of Chicago, Miss Margaret L. Smith, also a member of standing in the third or advisory department of the Exchange, came to New York City not long since and established a public stenographic bureau. Immediately the evils of the employment agency system here were forced upon her attention and she saw the broad field for operations of a similar character to those with which she had been identified in her former home. In response to a call from her issued in April of this year, twenty picked business women from the great mercantile, legal, literary and publishing firms of the city met for an informal discussion, with a view to safe-guarding the interests of their weaker sisters. At this meeting it was decided to request Miss Mary B. Cleveland, of Chicago, the founder and president of the entire Chicago system, to undertake the work of organization, which was concluded in May, with a charter membership of thirty of New York's cleverest business women. Although Miss Cleveland was retained as the honored head and founder of the organization, her broad interests in Chicago and elsewhere exclude her from actively directing the progress of the work. Miss Margaret L. Smith, already familiar with the work in Chicago, was elected chairman of the New York organization. Miss Euphemia Holden and Miss Etta Pitman were made secretary and treasurer.

The annual dues are fixed at $4 for such members as have an earning capacity of more than $10 per week, and $2 for such as are able to command less than that amount. Headquarters have been established at Room 1006, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Perhaps the strongest feature of the Chicago Exchange's departmental work—certainly the one which most appeals to the common sense and sentiment alike of the men and women who stand for a high code of morality in business life—is that known as the Advisory Department. Not only does it delicately suggest better training to the half-competent, and other means of livelihood to the incompetent, but it hedges about with conscientious investigation of business houses and business men the young women from country districts who are flocking by hundreds to the business centres. Many a mother, whose heart has been racked by anxiety for the welfare of the young daughter who must go out into the world alone to seek the living it owes her, is set at rest by learning of the official personnel of the Business Women's Exchange, and that she may rely upon their safe-guarding her daughter's best interests in securing her employment.

What is true of Chicago, doubtless soon will become true of the work of the New York organization. The scheme is a worthy one, which supplies a want in the up-to-date business woman's life; and its basic principle, that of mutual helpfulness, is one which should ensure it the friendly "lift" of every public-spirited citizen along the line.

ted some years ago, the artist took for his theme e Sacrifice of Iphigenia." Perhaps you know the y. Away back in Homeric times, Agamemnon, er of the Greeks, with his wife and daughter, Clytemra and Iphigenia, was leading his great fleet to ck Troy. Suddenly the fleet became becalmed. n Calchas, the wisest of the soothsayers, declared the gods were angry and the fleet could never con- e on its journey unless the beautiful princess genia was offered a sacrifice. So the artist pictures hese Homeric characters gathered about to slay the tiful Iphigenia to assuage the anger of the gods.

there among the myths a more sorrowful story? genia was saved in the end, but there are analo- cases in which no miracle interposes. How bitter be the reflections of some aged father, who, to wealth for himself or a title for his daughter, sacs her in a loveless marriage! He may be carried ard in society by the wind of fortune, but he has oy in his success as he realizes what it cost his hter. Oh, there are some sorrows beyond the h of an earthly comforter. Carry them where id carried his griefs and learn at least the value of heavenly peace.

erhaps King David's sorrow over Absalom may not been free from self-reproach. Could it be that he ected to pray for his son Absalom until it was too late? Should we not trust Christ for our children? You have tried your own strength long enough to prove it a failure; now will you not ask for the divine help? Some years ago, a poor wife and mother entered the study of the great London preacher, Charles H. Spurgeon. She told the minister her sad story. It was the old story of a dissipated husband and a heart-broken wife and mother. "There is nothing we can do," said Mr. Spurgeon, "but to kneel down and cry to the Lord for the immediate conversion of your husband. What he needs is not human aid, but divine rescue." "We knelt," said the great preacher, "and I prayed that God would bring the erring one back and convert his soul and make him a loving husband and a true Christian." When we arose from our knees I turned to the poor woman and said, "My dear woman, do not fret and worry about this matter. Trust God. I feel sure God will bring your husband back home." The praying woman went away. Some time after she came back to Mr. Spurgeon, and with radiant face exclaimed, "He has come back home to me and the children. He has come a converted man. Thank God! Thank God!" It was found that that husband in far-away lands was convicted of his sins and brought to Christ at the very time his wife and Mr. Spurgeon were on their knees praying for his conversion. Such incidents could be found in scores and thousands of homes, if we could only get into the inner hearts of men and women. Wives have prayed their husbands into the kingdom. Mothers and fathers have prayed their children into the kingdom. Friends have prayed their friends into the kingdom. Can you not pray your dear ones to Christ? Can you not get this peace of the Gospel for the joy of your own soul and also for the salvation of your dear ones? Will you not turn the darkness of the night into the joy of the morning?

"But," says some one, "when is this Gospel morning to break? Oh, the night has been so long for some of us. Why, I have been praying for my wayward child for twenty years. Is the night never going to end? And this awful sin of my youth—I have prayed and prayed to God to forgive me. I believe he has. I know he has. But that forgiveness does not wipe out its awful results. When shall I see the breaking day? When is my eastern horizon to be covered by the golden light of the rising sun?" When? Why, my brother, the Gospel sun is rising now. The dawn has been illuminating your eastern hills from the time you first gave your heart to Christ. It is not as bright now as it will be a few years hence; but if you only trust Christ and live for Christ your day will grow brighter and brighter every year, from day to day, until the eternal morning breaks, and you enter that land in which God shall wipe all tears from your eyes.

PASTOR SHELDON'S BRITISH CRUSADE

By Rev. William Durban

FOR the third time in his life Dr. Sheldon, of Topeka, Kan., is in England. He came on the first trip when a very young man, and he delights to tell how he managed to enjoy the visit to the United Kingdom at an amazingly cheap rate, for he could afford to travel only by observing the strictest economy. But his second appearance was under different conditions, for after the issue of his unique books, multitudes of people were eager to see and hear the author of In His Steps, The Crucifixion of Philip Strong, etc. He next went under the auspices of the great Christian Endeavor Societies, and addressed vast assemblies in various parts of the British Isles. A few years have passed, and England again welcomes him. Dr. Sheldon is now enlisted for a campaign of four months—a vigorous prohibition campaign. He is giving his energy not to preaching, though everywhere the churches would open to him their pulpits; but he is adhering faithfully to the terms of the invitation which he accepted from the great temperance agency known as the United Kingdom Alliance, which has its headquarters in Manchester and is the leading prohibition organization on the eastern side of the Atlantic. He has undertaken to give to the British people such an exposition of the principles of prohibition, illustrated by his observations and experiences in Kansas, as they have never had the opportunity of hearing before. Immense numbers are conscious of having received the benefit of a new revelation. The newspapers are giving more extended reports than have ever been furnished to the British public on this momentous topic.

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon

The benefit of such a propagandist tour is the greater because of the easy accessibility of all parts of the United Kingdom, whose forty millions of English, Welsh, Scotch, and Irish can all be reached as no equal number of people could in any other part of the globe. Dr. Sheldon is covering the whole area by giving his lectures at appointed centres. He landed at Liverpool on March 23, and plunged into his campaign the day after, by addressing a monster meeting in the immense Free Trade Hall at Manchester. That first week he lectured at important manufacturing towns in Lancashire—Warrington, Burnley and Southport. During April he went into Scotland, where enthusiastic audiences greeted him in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dumfries, Falkirk and Stirling. During the middle and latter portions of April, he carried the Prohibition banner down into the English Midlands, amongst the artisans of the great pottery districts, going thence westward into wild Wales, where he found an intensely warm welcome in the districts that had not long since witnessed the glorious results of the revival under the leadership of Evan Roberts. At Cardiff, Llanelly and Merthyr Tydfil the Welsh miners and laborers, the shipping porters and railway men, together with thousands of the most earnest members of the various churches, drank in with avidity the reports of Dr. Sheldon concerning the triumphs of local option and of State prohibition.

Along the southern coasts of England Dr. Sheldon had a series of ovations in Eastbourne, Southampton and Portsmouth. Thence he shot right away north again, and lectured at Darlington, Middlesborough, Sunderland, and Newcastle. As May rolled on, London welcomed him. Immense crowds listened to him at Whitefield's Tabernacle, at the great Assembly Hall in East London, at Christ Church, Westminster, and at Lyndhurst Church, Hampstead. Now, Dr. Sheldon is again in the provinces.

Dr. Sheldon appears to have struck the British shores exactly at the psychological moment. Prohibition is not a popular idea in the United Kingdom. Even local option has never been more than a doctrinaire theory. But a vast discontent has taken hold of the public mind, especially throughout the churches. The stupendous drink traffic has been tyrannical and triumphant during the long domination of the late Tory government under Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, who treated the colossal brewers and distillers very tenderly, and even patronized them politically. The great State church, also, has largely stood in fear of offending these "drink lords," some of whom are peers of the realm in the upper house, many others being members of the House of Commons. But the present Liberal government, under the premiership of Si Campbell-Bannerman, is dreaded by these mag drinkdom, for he has promised to introduce into ment a drastic licensing bill.

The visit of Dr. Sheldon is giving an enorm petus to the British Local Option party. Dr. S is wisely supplying a formidable array of incontro facts. He does not theorize, but talks as to w has seen under his own eyes in his own country. wisely concentrating himself on his own State. plains what has happened during the conflic quarter of a century in Kansas; how the peop declare prohibition a failure are generally the b who are always wrong; how the liquor trade ha entirely driven out of the State of Kansas; how has been reduced by one-half, and how pauperi become a negligible quantity. He says that th timent against drink is so strong that poli and business men dare not be seen drinking or o liquor to their friends, and that multitudes of people have never seen a saloon. He tells his ences that there is no solution of the problem saloon except "No Saloon." He laughs at the that prohibition is an impossibility, for he assur hearers that Kansas City, Kan., as distinguished the adjoining Kansas City, Mo., is as dry as the I of Sahara, so far as liquor is concerned, althou contains 90,000 inhabitants.

Many of the great people of the land are pro sit at Dr. Sheldon's feet and to entertain him. has been the guest at some splendid functions, v such noble members of society and leaders of re as the Earl and Countess of Carlisle, Sir H. Chis and Sir Wilfrid Lawson (son of the late champi the prohibition cause in England), have paid gra tributes to the visitor from Kansas. Dr. Sheldon m telling little speeches. At a breakfast meeting in verhampton, he said:

"Oh, beautiful England! In Kansas our scener the sky, and we have plenty of it, but not much on ground. I climb on Stirling Castle; I climb on Pe Peak; I view scenes such as are not in my country. say to myself, Where in the world are such prospects in Old England? After standing on those heig looking through those charming vales, unsurpasse the world, I come to the village that nestles at the of the crag, and the first thing I hit on is the saloon some poor wretches going in and out; and all the gl is taken away from the landscape."

BETTER DAYS IN THE CANAL ZONE

From a Special Correspondent

THE colossal work of canal construction on the Isthmus of Panama is progressing with amazing rapidity. Things are being done by leaps and bounds. What has been accomplished during the past two years seems almost incredible. Surprise and satisfaction are the feelings of nearly all who come to engage in the work. The Commission studies the needs of the employees. Improvements are taking place all around. Houses for married men are multiplying. Thus the men's wish to have their wives and children with them is being met.

The bachelor quarters, upon the whole, are comfortable. Care is taken that fresh, suitable food is provided at the hotels. Much attention is paid to the purity of the water supply. The sanitary department has wrought almost a miracle. Mosquitoes are conspicuous by their absence, and malarial fever is reduced to a small quantity. The majority of the employees are in good health.

The Commission has built and equipped four splendid Y. M. C. A. club houses. These are all in charge of fine, picked men, in every way suited to the work. These institutions, properly managed, will be conducive to untold blessing to the men. Three of these houses have been opened and are now in operation. It was our pleasure to take part on the opening days. The members of the Commission of the Zone, by their presence and addresses, gave encouragement to the work.

The Commission has also erected three fine church buildings. The first was opened recently for divine worship, and the others will soon be ready. All the ministers of the Gospel on the Zone will be at liberty to unite in conducting services in these churches. This, we believe, will tend to unity and harmony. It is equally important that the Gospel should be taken where no stated services are held, that the hundreds and thousands of laborers living in camps may hear the good news of help and hope. A hearty welcome awaits the missionary who, in an informal way, visits the camps and joins with the men in Christian songs. Then there is the opportunity of a helpful talk and of giving to each man a booklet or tract. Then come expressions of gratitude and the question: "Wh will you come again?"

The Missionaries' Rest

Elim Home, at Bell Island, near South Norwalk, Conn., a little over one hour's ride from New York City, is known far and wide as the "Missionaries' Rest." Rev. Wm. James writes to The Christian Herald: "We entertain, from one to several weeks, a number of this class without charge for board. They have been not only very grateful for the outing, but have been greatly benefited thereby. I have opened the Home again this summer for the same purpose." Elim is supported by voluntary contributions, which may be sent to Dr. James.

WHAT TWO GIRLS DID IN CHINA

The Transformation of the Taoist Nun—The "Thrown-Away Babies" and Their Friends

ABOUT nine months ago an article appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from the pen of Miss Gertrude Howe, of China, telling the remarkal story of the little Taoist nun, the cousin Dr. Mary Stone, a native of China. The present of Dr. Stone to America has brought to mind the y and many requests have come for the sequel. In f, the tale is as follows:

lary Stone ("Stone" being a translation of the Chi- name Shih, meaning "a stone") was born into a Cistian family, her father having been the first con- to Christianity in all of the Yangtse Valley. Ven Mary was eight years old, her father, then one the most valued native preachers of the Methodist Vsion, took her to Miss Howe, in Kiukiang, and asked ll she be trained for the medical profession. At nine- she entered Michigan University on English ex- nation, graduating with her degree of M.D. four rs later. Dr. Stone then returned to Kiukiang, re she has had charge of the hospital work for the l ten years.

n the same city, in the same year that Mary Stone born, another baby girl of the same family name me into the world, but this little one was born into a then home. "Rii Kuliang," as she is called, lost father when very young, and the mother at once ved she would never remarry, but devote her life searching for the true religion, adopting the life, toms and dress of the Taoist nun. In a very pretty le home on the outskirts of the city, this woman d a life of utter seclusion, her one companion being little daughter, who, as she grew older and proved be a beautiful girl, was educated in her home, and ught the three religions of the East; and she, too, opting the ugly garb of the Taoists, became known, e her mother, as a "truth-seeker."

The reputation of the two women for their piety me to the ears of the Emperor, who ordered that his l be placed over the gate, thus insuring their safety m molestation.

For many years, the Christian members of the Stone mily sought to gain admittance to the home, but it as not until two years ago that the door was opened them. Since then, Dr. Stone and her mother and ter have been in close touch with the Taoist nuns. hen they first went there, the younger woman, just r. Stone's age, had finished a fourth period of volun- ry seclusion, for at the age of sixteen she had shut rself in a little upper room, here she lived with her idols d books for three years, ming out at the end of this me for a year, then enter- g for three more years, un- l, when Dr. Stone gained cess to her, sixteen years ad been spent thus in all. During these terms of seclu- on, she held no communica- on with even her mother; aw no human face, heard o human voice, devoting her ntire life to the reading of he sacred books and worship- ng at the shrine of her idols. On her beautiful face and rms to-day can be seen reat ugly scars, where, in er eager longing to find avor with the gods and to atisfy the craving of her eart, she had cut with her wn hands pieces of her flesh nd offered them to the mages before her.

But God has used the dear little doctor-cousin to effect a change. The free, happy life of Dr. Stone attracted the little nun, and the gay, almost childlike spirit of the Christian, with her bright face and merry laughter, soon drew forth the confidence of the lonely recluse. First came the interchange of calls, and Rii Kuliang became intensely interested in the beautiful work of her cousin, spending hours following her about the hospital. Then the Bible was introduced and a copy placed in the hands of the "truth-seeker."

Last winter, just a short time before Dr. Stone and the writer started for America, Rii Kuliang accepted an invitation to come to our home in the medical compound, and for a week the timid, shrinking little Taoist nun lived and slept in the home of Christians, the first time in her life away from the idols. Here she saw the free, happy, useful life of her cousin. Each morning she attended prayers, hearing the sweet songs of faith and love.

A few days after our visitor had returned to her home, we went to call on her at "Purity Hall." A bright, eager face welcomed us. The mother said to Dr. Stone: "Since Rii Kuliang came back from your house, she hasn't been near her idols once!"

Oh, how our hearts praised God for the steady, unmistakable work of the Holy Spirit! The ugly garb of the Taoist has been laid aside; whenever possible the services in our little church on Sunday are attended; the Bible is being carefully studied; and just before we left China, Rii Kuliang said that in the fall she intends to come to our Woman's Bible Training School.

The "Thrown-Away Babies"

MISS GERTRUDE HOWE, a young missionary to Central China, was on her way to Kiukiang last November, to meet some newly arrived missionaries from America, in order to conduct them safely through the intricate path to Nanchang. While passing Wuchen, a letter-carrier came on board the steam launch with a bundle. It was a thrown-away baby girl that he had picked up on the street while going the rounds for the Imperial Post—one of China's latest reforms.

When he boarded the steam launch the passengers directed him to Miss Howe, who is well known in all that region for her kind deeds, especially to the daughters of China. She took several girls in infancy, adopted them and trained them to lives of usefulness. The people on the boat urged Miss Howe, "Take this child and do one more good deed;" but she said, "I'm too old now to undertake the responsibility of raising a baby, but you can take it to Miss Hughes."

So it was that the letter-carrier brought the baby to us. When we opened the bundle we found the tiniest mite, with a face like that of an old woman. The poor little body was covered with sores; but the baby was at once given a bath, dressed in clean clothes, and in a few days the aged look commenced to disappear. Miss Hughes named her foundling "Abbie," after her own saintly mother. The child is now growing finely.

A month later another baby was brought and left at the Danforth Memorial Hospital gate. It was in the evening. The child was found lying on the stone step where, if it had lain longer, it might have been devoured by the hungry scavenger dogs that abound in Chinese streets. She is just plain "Number Two"; for that is the way girl babies are designated in most of the homes in China.

Several years ago a little slave girl was brought to the hospital. Her owner said she was eight years old. She was a pitiful sight with sores and dirt. Moreover, she was deaf and dumb, and her owner, thinking she was dying, gave her over to the hospital. She has been cured of her ailments and has learned to talk a little. To-day she is as bright and attractive as any little girl. We named her after the noted American, Helen Keller.

Here in Kiukiang we often see girl babies thrown into ponds. With our own eyes we have seen babies that have been left outdoors over night and have been half devoured by dogs. Outside the city wall one still may see little whitewashed, brick built towers for the reception of thrown away babies.

I was the only physician in that district of five million people. When I heard that Miss Howe and another worker, Miss Housinger, had gone to the famine district to help rescue the children, I offered them the temporary use of the hospital. I am now in the United States on a short furlough, and expect to return in September to re-open the hospital. The children will then need to have a little place of their own where they will be cared for and taught to know God. Some of your readers may wish to have a share in this work.

It is this kind of suffering that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is helping so generously.

China's Famine Spreads to Yunnan

LETTERS and cable dispatches from China indicate that the famine in the southeastern provinces is now well under control. Food is now comparatively plentiful in the famine districts and thousands of laborers are employed at the public works. In remote districts there is still considerable suffering, but even this is being relieved.

From the province of Yunnan in southwest China, on the borderland of Tibet, an appeal has come to Shanghai for help. It now seems that, while the whole energies of the missionary and civic committees were employed in relieving the needs of the starving in the five southeastern provinces, Yunnan was invaded by the famine. A great battle has been fought with hunger and disease in that unfortunate province, and it is learned that the famine is still raging there with unabated severity. In view of these facts, Viceroy Lu Hai Haan and all the leading officials at Shanghai have united in an effort to send help to Yunnan. They have urged that the flour contributed by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers and sent to Chinkiang on the U.S.A. troopship Logan (which arrived after the Buford had distributed her great relief cargo) should be sent to Yunnan immediately, where it will be distributed by missionaries and will be the means of saving thousands from starvation. The government has sent half a million taels to Yunnan, but food is unpurchasable.

The Missionary Committee at Chinkiang and the Shanghai Civic Committee have both approved the plan to send the Logan's flour to the distant province. The transportation charges will be defrayed by the Chinese authorities, who have also gratefully declared their intention of proclaiming through the length and breadth of Yunnan the splendid generosity of the Americans, who have done so much for China in the present crisis.

The Exposition's Narrow Escape

IT was fortunate for the success of the Jamestown Exposition that the recent fire to the west of the grounds was brought under control before any of the Exposition buildings were harmed. The fire originated in one of the temporary wooden structures and spread rapidly. Eight large hotels and many smaller buildings were destroyed. The loss is estimated at several hundred thousand dollars and about a thousand people were for a time made homeless. The Exposition Fire Department and the Powhatan Guard did splendid work, and that the Exposition itself was not harmed is due to their efforts. For a while the Inside Inn and the Kentucky State Building were menaced by the burning brands that were brought over by the high wind. Their walls were kept constantly wet until the danger was over.

The Exposition has been somewhat unfortunate in its earlier history. It was opened before the buildings, exhibits or hotels were ready for the great rush of visitors, and this gave the impression that it would be a long time before it was in running order. A few weeks, however, did wonders and at present the Exposition is very well worth seeing, and will be until closing time this fall. Learning by experience, the management has cut off several useless departments and strengthened those connected with exhibits and the general amusement of the public. The good results of these changes are already apparent.

Missionary Co-operation

HEARTY welcome has been given in Great Britain to the deputation of American laymen who are striving for the unification of the Christian world in the foreign mission field. Prominent men of all denominations, including Bishops of the Established Church, have accepted the idea enthusiastically, and in both England and Scotland committees were organized to co-operate with that in America. The need for a better organized and more methodical system of missionary work is realized there as clearly as it is here, and there is on both sides a disposition to accept the help of laymen in effecting a more thorough supervision. That the Mission Boards ought to welcome such help was clearly shown by the American delegation, who pointed out that the contributions to Missions, now amounting to $21,800,000 a year, would be enormously increased if the public had the guarantee that the expenditure was supervised by energetic, experienced business men. The Boards have the same desire for efficiency that the laymen have, but they are sometimes hampered by considerations that the lay committee would not respect.

Still more hopeful is that union of churches which the lay committees would endeavor to effect. The people of heathen lands, especially the intelligent people of India and Japan, are puzzled by the divisions of the Christian church and by the different creeds presented to them by denominational missionaries. There is, as one of the American delegates told the English representatives, "a prevalent suspicion that a large part of the money invested is expended in emphasizing differences of theological views and ecclesiastical organization." This is not the message of Christianity to the heathen. It is positively mischievous in presenting the differences instead of the essential unity of the churches. If the public could be assured that Christ was being preached and not the "isms," there would be more confidence in the work and larger contributions to it. The laymen hope to produce this effect, not by establishing a new missionary board, nor by interfering with established organizations, but by studying the foreign field and by suggesting means of co-operation for the common end.

Ostracizing the Liar

GOOD service has been done by President Hadley of Yale in warning young men against lying. We wish he had gone further, as he might very wisely have done, but we gratefully acclaim the step he did take. He said, "We all recognize that no man is worthy of our tolerance who departs from the truth for selfish reasons, or who habitually neglects it for any reason whatever." It will be something gained if educated men refuse to tolerate a man who will lie for the sake of gain, or who is an habitual liar of any kind. It ought to work at least a partial reformation if it becomes known that lying is not "good form," and that a too common indulgence in it may exclude a man from refined society. If, from the ranks of the liars, those were eliminated who lie to protect themselves, to get gain, or to promote their own interests in any way—that is, who lie for selfish reasons—there would be a marked diminution in the great army. Those who lie for the benefit of other people, the unselfish liars, are an inconsiderable minority. Their altruism is popularly regarded as extenuating their guilt, but it leaves the liar branded as untrustworthy, a man whose statements must be taken with the proverbial grain of salt.

This is low ground to take in a matter so serious, but there are some men who cannot be met on the mountain-tops and must be sought on the plain. They are not deterred from lying by the consideration that it is odious in the sight of God, that God declares that he will surely punish the liar, or that one of the characteristics of the man he loves is that he will not lie. They dread far more the ostracism and the social contempt which President Hadley would evoke. If the man "who is found to be habitually untruthful is first distrusted and then cast out, just as completely as we distrust and cast out the man who is physically uncleanly," as President Hadley recommends, the punishment is understood and dreaded and will have its deterrent effect. We know that lying is sinful, but if a man will not abandon the habit for that reason, he may do so when he learns that it is disgraceful, and that he will lose the respect of men, as well as the favor of God, if he persists in it. That seems to be President Hadley's opinion, and we heartily hope that his words may produce the effect he desires.

WHILE nothing of supreme importance has yet resulted from the deliberations at the Hague, all the leading Powers are apparently settling down to practical work. Among the more notable propositions introduced are these: by Germany—exempting hospital ships from capture as belligerents; by France—for the appointment of special Commissions of Inquiry for the adjustment of international disputes, subject to convention between the two conflicting parties; by the United States—forbidding the bombardment of unfortified and undefended towns and villages in war time; by Argentina—modifying the Drago doctrine so as to permit of forcible collection of international debts under certain extreme conditions, and if payment is still refused after final appeal. Several other propositions have been discussed, some relative to good offices and friendly mediation, and some designed to mitigate the horrors of war and to prevent the useless waste of life and property. Much of the Conference's time has been devoted to the consideration of measures for protecting neutrals.

These are all excellent and even important in their way; but the real purpose of summoning the Conference—the object for which it was created—has not even been approached during the present session. The perpetuity of the Conference as an authoritative World's Peace Court and the restriction or limitation of land and sea armaments are topics which all the Powers seem to avoid. Those governments having great armies, capable of quick mobilization, will brook no interference with their military or naval establishments. Besides, international jealousy is an obstinate stumbling-block in the peace programme and one which it does not seem possible to surmount.

Still, we are slowly groping toward the light. Ultimately the Hague Court will come to be generally acknowledged as an impartial authority in international disputes. To reach this end it must proceed by slow stages. Its principles must be represented by statesmen and jurists who will make it their business to bring promptly before it all proper causes. Its summonses, its edicts, its judgments will gradually come to be sustained by all civilized nations. In his address at the Hague, M. Nelidoff, President of the Conference, voiced this ultimate hope when he counseled the delegates not to be discouraged "from dreaming of the ideal of universal peace and the fraternity of peoples, which are, after all, but the natural higher aspirations of the human soul."

Should some strong, commanding personality arise in the Conference as the advocate of peace and humanity, he might obtain a hearing, but his eloquence would hardly affect the result. The time apparently is still far off when the swords shall be beaten into plowshares and the spears into pruning-hooks.

Teach the Boy a Trade

IT is a good thing to be afforded a glimpse o[f] ourselves occasionally, as we appear to other [eyes]. Two hundred European teachers were brought ove[r] a year ago by Sir Alfred Mosely to study our [public] school system. Their report has been published, [and] is attracting very general attention in educational circles abroad. Doubtless it will become a basis for [many] excellent reforms to be introduced in the foreign sch[ools], for the Commission has found much to commend i[n our] advanced educational methods.

There is, however, one important defect to whic[h the] report calls attention. It is the comparative la[ck of] trade high schools here. In all other respects, [the] Commission finds our system practically perfect [and] superior to anything in European countries. [Herr] Ullmann, Provincial School Director of Berlin, say[s]:

> In prevailing conditions trade schools are an absolute nece[ssity]. Our boys cannot all become professional men. Many branch[es of] commerce and industry are so specialized that training i[s ab]solutely necessary. Unless we provide this training, our sc[hools] will turn out a lot of idlers who have no future, unless [their] wealthy parents can stake money in some venture.

This is a valuable hint to our School Boards. It is [un]questionable that technical training should be the nat[ural] climax of the education of a very large proportion of [the] youth of our nation. All cannot be professionals, an[d so] make an effort to train all as though they were desti[ned] for a professional career is one of the worst of blund[ers]. In Europe, many of the young princes of royal ho[uses] are taught the use of tools and machinery. The [boy] who has been trained to an honest trade or some defi[nite] industrial calling, whether his parents be rich or po[or], has an anchor to windward that will stand by him [in] many a storm. On the other hand, the young m[an] whose education leaves him unequipped for the battle [of] life is in danger of becoming a good-for-nothing.

We trust the day is not far distant when our admira[ble] school system will be so supplemented by techni[cal] training that every boy will be able to work with ha[nd] and brain at some useful employment.

Next Week, "Gabrielle!"

— THE issue of the coming week will have as [its] great attraction the first instalment of our new seri[al], one of the most intensely interesting THE CHRISTI[AN] HERALD has ever published, "Gabrielle, the Flower [of] New Rochelle." Readers who wish their friends [and] relatives to enjoy this story with them should have the[m] subscribe in time to get the opening chapters, and [to] make the acquaintance of Gabrielle, Louis Marquan[d] and the dashing captain of King Louis' Royal dragoon[s]. We believe the pages, filled as they are with thrillin[g] adventure and great historical pictures of life in th[e] seventeenth century, will be read again and again. D[o] not miss this finest story of the year.

Red Cross Conference

FROM all lands delegates of the Red Cross Society met in London recently, to hold a General Conference. They presented an imposing appearance, many of them wearing full military naval uniforms. The great soldiers and sailors were no means out of place there, for they have witnessed horrors of war, and are best fitted to appreciate the eficent work done by the Society. Queen Alexan- is president of the British branch of the Society, but place was filled by Lord Roberts, the greatest British eral now living, whose genius turned the tide of for- e in the Transvaal war. The Queen, however, sent etter of cordial welcome to the delegates, which was d by Lord Roberts. Letters were read also from the wager-Empress of Russia, and Miss Florence Night- gale, the veteran nurse whose services in the Crimea 1854 gave the first initiative to the activities which veloped the Red Cross movement. After reading the ters Lord Roberts gave a brief survey of the work Society, and stated that since 1870 two and a half llion dollars had been collected and disbursed by the ciety in its beneficent work. A graceful response s made by the Marquis de Vogue, president of the ench Red Cross Society. Speeches were also made the American delegation, which included Gen. Robert . O'Reilly, Col. William Sanger, Mr. Ernest P. cknell, and Miss Mabel Boardman.

The Conference was in ssion five days, during hich details of the work ere considered, such as e kind of coverings for st aid dressings, the em- oyment of trained dogs earing supplies for the ounded on the battlefield, d other details. An ex- aordinary proposal was ade at one of the sessions y Gen. Omer Pasha, the urkish delegate to the onference. He moved at as the symbol of the ross was objectionable to Iohammedans all over the orld, and was an emblem f a creed opposed to the eligious belief of his peo- le, the name and sign e dropped by the Society, nd that in future it be nown as the Society of the ed Crescent, and a cres- ent be used as its emblem. here was decided opposi- ion manifested on all sides o the proposal, and the onference decided that he motion be not enter- ained. The delegates acted isely. The cross is the ppropriate symbol of the ercy and kindness and ompassion for the suffering, hich the Society is organized to manifest. It is the mblem of self-sacrifice and of all the love and tender- ess which inspires the work of the Society, and the onference would have been recreant to its faith and pirit, if it had yielded to the demand for change. The ociety might well say with the Apostle:

God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord esus Christ, by whom the world is crucified, unto me and I unto he world. (Gal. 6: 14.)

ar Tracks Removed

One of the Justices of the Supreme Court of New York tate issued an order a few days ago for the removal of he car tracks of a surface railroad from an important treet in the city. He gave the company ninety days in hich to take up its tracks and restore the street to its ormer condition. The Court had been moved to its action y the Attorney-General, who complained that the com- any had not fulfilled the terms of its franchise. He lleged that ten years had passed since the company was ncorporated, and five years since construction had been ommenced, yet the road was not in running order. The ompany pleaded in excuse that it had been involved in tigation, had been restrained by injunctions, and had een obliged to leave the road unfinished, and operate by other franchises which had been assigned to it. The plea does not appear to have availed with the Justice, who peremptorily ordered the removal of the unused tracks. A similar thing sometimes happens to the Christian. If he has talents, facilities, or opportunities of service that he is not using, God bears with his indolence awhile, but eventually takes them from him.

The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof. (Matt. 21 : 43.)

A Famous Family Extinct

A distinguished noble family of Austria became extinct by the death of its last lineal representative in New York last week. In a cheap boarding-house, attended by a kindly physician, who gave him gratuitous service, an Austrian baron died in extreme poverty. He had once been an aide-de-camp to Francis Joseph, the present Emperor of Austria. He had distinguished himself in the war between Austria and France, and was present at Villafranca when the two Emperors signed the treaty of peace at the end of that war. He returned with the army to Vienna, where he enjoyed the favor of the Emperor. But seven years later, some event occurred which caused the Baron to give up all his places and distinctions, obliterate himself and come to America. He could never be induced to say what that event was, even to his most intimate friends in this country. He supported himself here by his skill in heraldry, and would design coats of arms for families needing them. Little jobs in translation and other small services sufficed to supply him with his modest expenses, until recently, when he fell ill. A fellow-countryman, who knew how illustrious was the position of his family in Austria, then came to his assistance and provided for his needs until his death. This friend said that the Baron could trace his pedigree for seven centuries, during which representatives of the family had distinguished themselves in the service of the Austrian government. It was sad that his own services and those of his family should have been so utterly forgotten, but that is often the fate of those who trust in princes.

It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes. (Psalm 118 : 9.)

A Fatal Building Collapse

Disregard of warning resulted recently in New York in seven deaths. A tenement house in the lower part of the city was reported as far back as May 6 to be unsafe; yet a man and woman, their seven children and a lodger continued to live in it. It was cheap, and better quarters downtown were not easy to obtain. The owners shored it up and began to make repairs. But a new building was to be built on the next lot, and a deep excavation was made for its foundation. It is supposed that the excavation at its side further weakened the tottering structure, but the inmates remained in it. The folly of their course was proved a few days ago, when the house suddenly collapsed. Six of the children and the lodger were caught under the falling walls and beneath the old beams and instantly killed. The man and his wife and one child alone escaped. How pitiful it is that there should be in a great city poverty so dire that mothers and fathers must run such risks because they can afford no safer quarters. There are some parents who expose their children to moral peril, who have not that excuse. They are so anxious for their temporal prosperity that they are heedless of their spiritual safety.

And Lot lifted up his eyes and beheld all the plain of Jordan that it was well watered everywhere. . . . Then Lot chose him all the plain. . . . But the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the Lord. (Gen. 13: 10-13.)

A Wealthy Prisoner

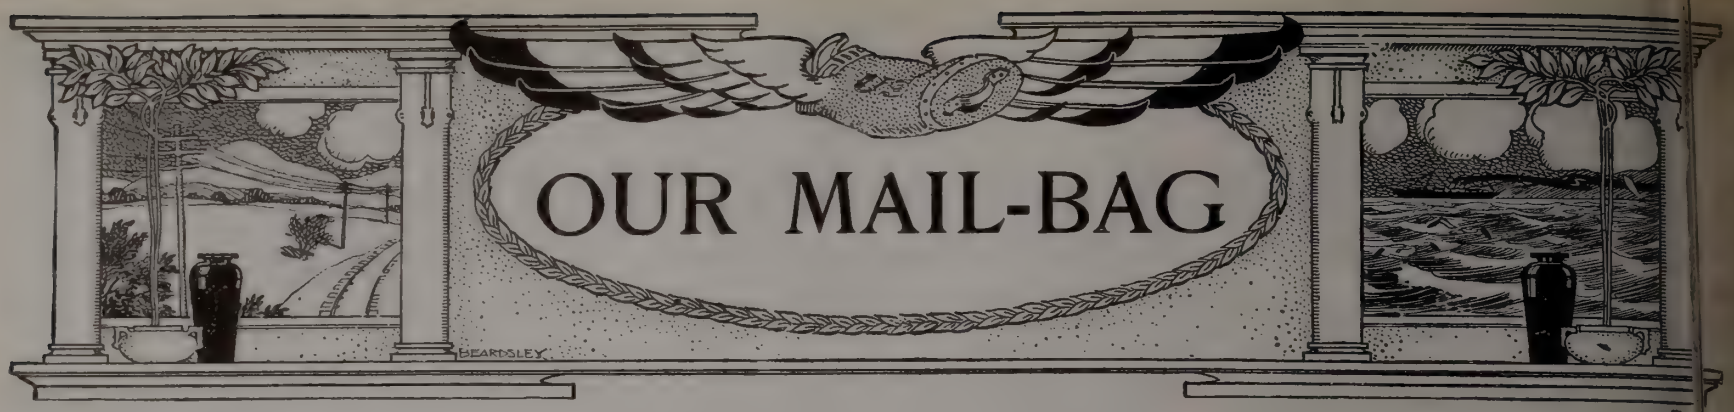
An accounting was filed last week in the Supreme Court by the American Trust Company of the estate of a prisoner. The man murdered a lawyer nine years ago, and was arrested and tried. He escaped execution on the plea of insanity and was sent to Dannemora for life. Before his trial he sent all the property he possessed, including a number of valuable railroad bonds, to his mother, then living at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany. She was a thrifty old lady, and she reinvested the dividends on the bonds as she received them, and when she died recently she left those and all her property, which amounted to more than eighty thousand dollars, to her son. Some of the railroads declined to pay any more dividends, as the man to whom the bonds belonged was dead in the eyes of the law. The case was carried to the Supreme Court, which appointed the trust company a trustee to receive the funds until a decision was rendered on the case. How bitterly that man must regret the crime which keeps him in prison, while he possesses abundant wealth that he cannot use!

A man to whom God hath given riches, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof, but a stranger eateth it. (Eccles. 6 : 2.)

A Girl's Fear

A peculiarly sad case came to light in New York a few days ago. A girl of sixteen years, singularly bright and of remarkable beauty, began to brood recently and withdraw from her associates. She was often observed weeping, and her mother sought in vain to learn the cause of her depression. At last she told her secret. She had discovered a slight curvature of her spine and had been to a doctor about it. He had told her it would be possible to cure it, but she would have to go to a hospital and undergo treatment that might continue several months. She had a horror of hospitals and shrank from going there. Finally, under pressure, she submitted to an examination, and the hospital surgeon confirmed the other doctor's opinion. The girl still refused to become a patient, and the surgeon, hoping to overcome her reluctance, showed her a photograph of a typical sufferer from the disease. The girl was stricken with horror at the picture, and instead of being induced by it to undergo treatment, she fell into despair and went out and drowned herself. She made the mistake common with the timid. The same disposition often characterizes sinners, who, in spite of all the encouragement God holds out to them in his Word, shrink from applying the remedy that would save them.

As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: why will ye die? (Ezek. 33 : 11.)



Questions and Answers

M. C. G., Sarnia, Ont. Does not the mention of the death of Judas, in Acts 1: 18 imply accidental death, not suicide?

No. Peter was simply making a speech, not writing history. It was as much as to say that all Judas got by his treachery was the privilege of purchasing a graveyard, and that was done for him by others. Peter's account of his death may have been more detailed than Matthew's. If Judas hanged himself from one of the trees overlooking the valley of Hinnom and the branch broke, letting him fall over the precipice, the result would be as Peter stated and would be in harmony with Matthew's version.

Jennie T., Helena, Mont. Is fortune-telling right? Is it right for us to try to find out what is in the future for us? Does the Bible say anything against it?

Fortune-tellers, amateur or professional, are humbugs, who live off credulous people. There are many passages in the Bible warning us to avoid witches, necromancers and the like. See Micah 5: 12; Deut. 18: 10-12; I. Sam. 15: 23; Gal. 5: 20; Lev. 19: 31, and 20: 6.

E. E. K., Grand Junction, Colo., Mrs. O. E. B., Illiopolis, Ill., and others. Did God really harden Pharaoh's heart, as is stated over and over again? If so, was it just to harden it and then punish him for it?

You must make allowance for the Hebrew mode of thought and expression. The Scripture writers saw God in every event, and attributed every occurrence to him. Thus, when they say God hardened Pharaoh's heart, they mean that the hardening was the result of God's providence. You may have known men on a sick-bed vow that if they recovered, they would lead a better life, and when God mercifully restored them to health, they were worse men than before. Their hearts were hardened. A Hebrew writer would say God hardened them. It was the result of his mercy. Time and again a plague was removed from Pharaoh when he humbled himself, and then he became hard again. God was very patient with Pharaoh, and the result of his patience was the hardening of Pharaoh's heart by the very process which should have softened it. Theodoret reminds us that the same sunshine that melts the wax hardens the clay.

H. N., Hyannis, Mass. What was the strange fire offered by Nadab and Abihu? (Lev. 10: 1.)

If you turn to Lev. 6: 13 you will find there a record of a fire on the altar believed to be miraculously kindled, which was never to go out. This the priests were to take and put in their censers and sprinkle the incense upon it. No other fire was to be used. Probably Nadab and Abihu took any ordinary fire, and this, being strictly prohibited, was punished. It is supposed they were intoxicated, for immediately afterward (Lev. 10: 9) the priests were cautioned against drinking intoxicants before going to perform their duties.

R. T. R., Knowles, Calif. Who is the Rev. R. J. Campbell? Does the New Theology he preaches deny the divinity of Christ?

Rev. R. J. Campbell is a Congregational minister of London, England. He succeeded Dr. Joseph Parker as pastor of the City Temple, one of the largest and most influential churches in London. His services on Thursday mornings attract a very distinguished congregation. Members of Parliament, barristers and merchants throng to hear him. The New Theology does not deny the divinity of Christ, but is more offensive to the orthodox people than if it did. It teaches that any Christian whose life is consecrated and devout may become a son of God in the same sense that Christ was the Son of God.

E. H. B., Danbury, Conn. Does God ever act in anger?

It is impossible to conceive of Deity being subject to anger, in the sense in which we know it as a merely human passion. One cannot conceive of the All-Wise as in a bad temper. There is, however, a holy and just displeasure with sin, a righteous indignation at all wickedness, of which we are told in many Scripture passages, and these are doubtless what are meant when anger is ascribed to God.

Reader, Hamilton, Ont. 1. Were the angels entertained by Lot earthly or heavenly beings? 2. What method do the elders of Presbyterian churches in New York City adopt to invite members to the Lord's Supper?

1. Heavenly messengers, commissioned to execute divine judgment against Sodom—presumably the same angels who had been with Abraham (Gen. 18: 2). 2. All members of Christian churches who are in good standing, and who love the Lord Jesus, are invited.

Several Readers. The recent notice in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of a new cure having been discovered for the opium habit has brought us many letters. The plant, which is said to effect a cure, has been identified as the Combretum Sundaicum of Miquel, by Professor Holmes, curator of the Pharmaceutical Society. It grows in and near Selangor in the Malay peninsula and also at other places along the Malacca Straits, and can be procured at Singapore. It resembles a grapevine but has a pear-shaped leaf. A tea is made of the leaves with hot water, and the patient drinks this three times daily. It is said that 250,000 have already been permanently cured.

J. V. C., Waxahachie, Texas. 1. Christ said (Mark 4: 12) that his reason for speaking in parables was lest men be converted. Did he not wish their conversion? 2. Why do the Scriptures so often represent God as repenting, as in Ex. 32: 14? 3. How can faith be counted for righteousness as Paul says (Rom. 4: 5)?

1. Matthew reports our Lord's words more fully and clearly. (Matt. 13: 15.) The people's hearts were so dull and gross that they would not listen to his teaching and be converted, so he told them stories to which they would listen, and through them the truth found entrance to their hearts. Æsop's fable of "The Fox and the Grapes" may possibly have impressed the people who listened to it more than would a long discourse. 2. It is [illegible]ely the Hebrew method of writing abou[illegible]God as if he were a man. God is unwill[illegible] to punish, if men will repent and reform[illegible]nd he frequently suspended the punis[illegible]ent he had threatened. The people ta[illegible]ted him with this change of mind, and E[illegible]iel explained it to them and justified [illegible]od. (See Ezekiel 33: 10-20.) 3. The co[illegible]last is between a man who fulfils the la[illegible]ac-cording to his idea, and a man who i[illegible]on-scious of failure and pleads for m[illegible]y. The parable of the Pharisee and the [illegible]b-lican is a case in point. Faith in [illegible]ist produces righteousness, and when Go[illegible]es it in the heart he accepts it for right[illegible]us-ness, knowing what it will produce.

Skilled Workmen in a Noonday Service at Collinwood, O.

IN the great locomotive repair shops at Collinwood, Ohio, which are among the largest repair shops in the world, there are nearly 2,000 men employed. The majority of these are highly skilled workmen, clear of eye and brain, and firm of hand. Every part of the locomotives, to the smallest fraction of an inch, must be turned out with precision. One of the interesting and inspiring sights at these great shops is the noonday religious service, when many of these men gather in front of the massive machinery, as shown in the photograph, listen to the words of the speaker and join heartily in the singing.

Our "Jonah and the whale" riddle has awak[illegible]ed very general interest a[illegible]g CHRISTIAN HERALD rea[illegible]s. Miss Abbie M. Peffers, Va[illegible]t-port, Conn., writes, gi[illegible]g this quaint story of [illegible]e origin of the riddle:

A great many years a[illegible] a prominent merchant in Tau[illegible]n, Mass., promised an eccentri[illegible]d woman, named Lucy King, [illegible]t if, taking her subject from [illegible]e Bible, she would compose a [illegible]d-dle which he could not gue[illegible]e would give her a certain [illegible]e. This riddle was the result.

Rev. J. T. Moore, Br[illegible]-ville, Tenn., sends ano[illegible]r riddle, which we print [illegible]-low:

Some say I exist in the dea[illegible]'t night,
But philosophers haven't dec[illegible]'t that quite.
I'm familiar with no ma[illegible]
Much less with woman.
I was just thirty minutes [illegible] heaven for once.
Answer this riddle if you [illegible]

Possibly those who cleverly solved the first p[illegible]zle may find this second [illegible] equally easy. We shall [illegible] glad to hear from our re[illegible]ers in the matter.

J. E. J., Cambria, Wis. How ma[illegible] feet of gas will a gallon [illegible] gasoline make?

We are indebted to t[illegible] editor of the Scientific Ame[illegible]can, New York City, f[illegible] the following answer: "O[illegible] gallon of gasoline will gi[illegible] approximately 37½ feet [illegible] pure gasoline vapor at a[illegible] mospheric pressure. When this vapor [illegible] mixed with air for burning, the volun[illegible] will vary from 90 to 110 cubic feet of a[illegible] and gasoline vapor."

L. R., Germantown, Pa. Yes; the United States has decided to repay to China over $12,000,000, being little more than half the indemnity awarded to our government four years ago for losses entailed on our consuls and American citizens in China during the Boxer riots. This restitution was purely voluntary and was not even asked by China. Ten other governments got indemnity for the same causes, but up to the present time no other government has offered to return any portion of the sums received.

UR LITTLE GUESTS AT MONT-LAWN

oft-repeated old saw is that which in substance declares that "one half the world does not know what the other half is doing." No individual has rer conception of the truth of that statement than untry-bred woman, reared amidst the sights and of Mother Nature in her most bountiful mood, ransplanted in maturity to a life which involves arity with the environments of helpless childhood poorest tenement section of a great city like York.

ile yet the books of our Children's Home were to receive applications from little ones anxious to cluded in the initial Mont-Lawn con- ent, there entered our office one rare morning a sad-faced woman, poorly eatly clad in black, leading an ex- g frail-looking little girl of about years, whose slender right arm was d rigidly to her side. The widow er fatherless child had come to seek romise of an outing among the hills neadows of the far-famed CHRISTIAN D CHILDREN'S HOME at Mont-Lawn. le, sympathetic questioning brought he details of the heart-breaking his- of this "widow indeed," to whose ed spirit the ministry of Christian lvship was as "the oil of joy for ning."

e wearing and prolonged illness which ded her worthy husband's death two ago had left her weak and penniless, e the responsibilities of life with two l children, a strong lad of seven and e, blue-eyed bairnie of five years. ely the widowed young mother faced ard conditions, and she had succeeded, int of unremitting toil, in keeping the from the door. Last winter, return- to her humble room from a long day bor, she was occupied with her house- tasks, her little daughter meanwhile ting the tired woman by "making t for mamma."

a moment the poor mother was tled by a piercing shriek and turned e her child wrapped in flames. There no words to describe the anguish of mother heart as her baby girl, severely burned unconscious, was borne by stranger hands to the bulance, and thence, alas! to the "charity ward" of blic hospital.

elieving that there was no hope of saving the little 's life, the physicians for some time administered atives to allay the torturing smart of the wounds, without properly dressing them. When, contrary to expectation, the child rallied, the flesh of the arm had adhered to the side and it was impossible to detach it. As strength returned, minor operations were repeatedly performed, but as the heated term set in, it was decided that the tiny, wasted creature must be restored to a greater degree of general health and strength by living in the open, before the finally successful treatment could be applied.

Now came the blessed "ministry of service" of our dear Children's Home. On June 26, a happy, hopeful mother a bright boy by her side, who sturdily announced that he was "going to stay and help take care of mother"—saw her little Flora depart from the Bible House, bound for Mont-Lawn, under the especially tender personal care of a cheery young caretaker, whose heart was already overflowing with love for the fair-haired little semi-invalid. There, roaming the fields of velvety green, sitting under the hedge-rows cool and shady, braced and invigorated by the refreshing breezes from the river, one more war victim of conditions which place a woman's tasks in the weak hands of a child is renewing her strength to go on in the battle of life.

Their Playground the Baking Sidewalk

Let us trace to its source the direct opportunity for little Flora to go to our Children's Paradise. Miles away, among the Pennsylvania hills, there dwells a family consisting of husband and wife, with a warm corner by the home fireside for the old father and mother. There, among the birds and flowers, they have lived their simple, God-fearing, uneventful life, blessed, until one short year ago, by the presence of the sunny faced little daughter of the house. One day the mother was busily employed in the roomy farm-house kitchen, her nine-year old daughter playing about the door yard. Becoming gradually conscious of an unusual silence, the mother turned to call, then to search hastily for her little girl, only to find a broken well-curb, a still form, and the agonizing truth that little Esther "was not, for God took her."

Through the tears and the loneliness, the aching mother heart has found unspeakable solace in forwarding to the Children's Home treasury the little tin bank, crowded with pennies, which her darling had accumulated. "I send them to you," she writes, "to help answer the cry of the children."

Be sure that above the white bed, where nightly little Flora's maimed figure nestles, there hangs the portrait of a curly haired, white-frocked, sweet faced Pennsylvania girl—Esther. The store of pennies, carefully saved by the cherished daughter who no longer brightens the old farm, may, in our Father's "mysterious way," preserve another little life to grow to useful and gracious womanhood.

Print and gingham gowns, under-garments, boys shirt-waists and knee trousers, either new or out-grown, and neatly mended, are a keenly felt lack in Mont-Lawn's domestic economy. Many a kind heart, backed by only a scanty purse, may be prompted to "take account of stock" in the nursery and the attic, and send the surplus to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N. Y., express prepaid. We shall be grateful, and the little ones will rejoice in a supply of suitable clothing to replace their few torn and ragged garments. "Little is much when God is in it."

ENDEAVORERS IN CONVENTION

UR All for Christ and Country and World." This is the significant motto of the Twenty-third International Convention of the Christian Endeavor Society, which meets to-day Seattle, Wash. There, among banners and blos- s and crimson and white streamers, amid a whirl splendid inspiration, the biennial assembly is now ng on.

Successful religious organizations are not yet so merous that there is not room for more. The Chris- n Endeavor movement has made itself a permanent d stable factor in religious life and progress. To the world for Christ is the central idea. Year by r the movement for world evangelization is enthusi- ically endorsed. This year an entire day is to be oted to the subject of training for missionary ser- e at home and abroad. The greatest weekly list ever recorded—eighty- new societies in a single week from twenty-three tes and thirteen denominations—has been a feature of the year's advance. The world-wide enrolment of Christian Endeavor Societies now includes sixty-eight countries and nearly 70,000 local organizations, of which about two-thirds are in the United States. At an average of fifty members to a society, the total world-wide membership is estimated at three and one-half millions. About eighty denominations are represented.

Mr. Von Ogden Vogt
General Secretary

The programme, briefly stated, is as follows:

July 10. Annual Business Meeting of U. S. C. E. and election of Board of Trustees.
" " Evening. Inaugural address of General Secretary Shaw and annual address of President Clark.
July 11. Sunrise prayer meetings; Workers' Training Classes.
" " Afternoon. Junior Rally.
" " Evening. Services; theme—"The Complete Christian."
July 12. Discussion: "Christian Endeavor a Federation Inter-denominational, International, Interracial."
" " Afternoon. Denominational Rallies.
" " Evening. "Relations of Christianity with Religions of other Races."
July 13. Sunrise prayer meetings; Workers' Training Classes.
" " Afternoon. Excursions to points of interest in and around Seattle.
" " Evening. Praise Festival.
July 14. Convention Sermons in the various churches.
" " Afternoon. Evangelistic Services.
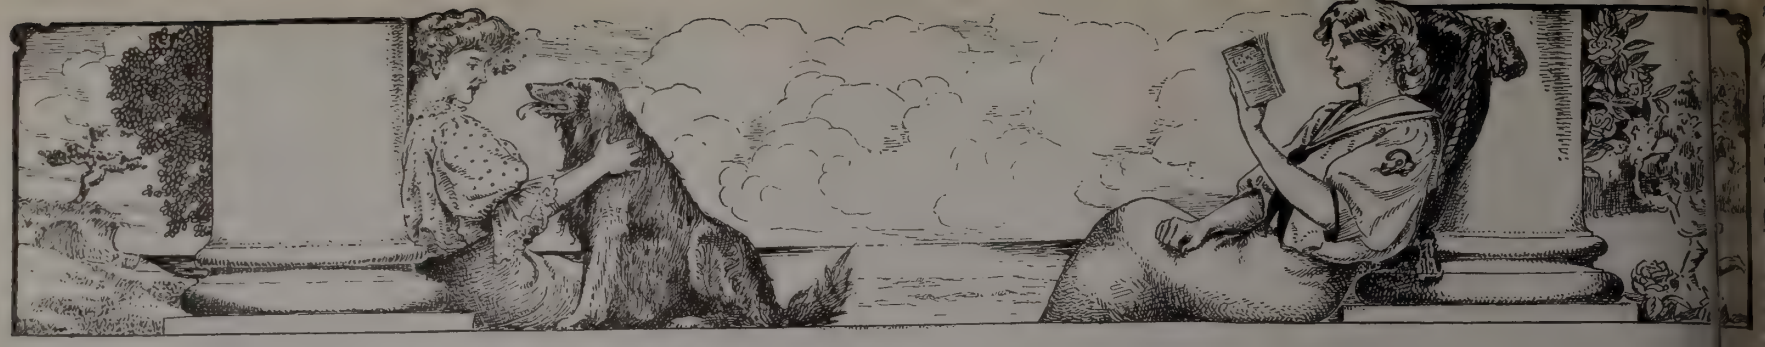
" " Evening. Convention Services dealing with the theme, "Old Truths for Present Day Needs."
July 15. Discussion: "Training of Missionaries."
" " Afternoon. Discussion: "A New Life," and "A New World."
" " Evening. "Purpose Meeting" and roll call of States and countries. Giving out charges to departing members. Convention adjourns 9 P.M.

The Seattle Convention is what might be called a training meeting. Preparation for Christian service is its keynote. It is Hon. George Nicholls, M.P., of England, who impresses the need of the day for trained Christians. Mrs. Francis E. Clark speaks on training the children and conducts the women's meeting.

Plans are to be made for the quarter-centenary memorial structure in Boston (commemorating twenty-five years of Christian Endeavor), and for the Fourth World's Christian Endeavor Convention, to be held in India in 1910. J. A. S.



ON THE HOME VERANDA

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Art of Keeping Cool

THE midsummer heats this year have followed a peculiarly late and reluctant spring. Fires were needful long after the usual time for dispensing with them, and winter clothing was worn by prudent people weeks beyond the coming in of June. We heard a great deal about blighted fruit and vegetables, and the pessimist was much in evidence, affirming with emphasis that we were to have in 1907 no summer at all.

Meanwhile, there was the same activity on the part of our little friends the birds as in seasons of milder manners and warmer moods, and the work of nest-building went on before our eyes, and presently there were tiny birds in the nest, and the father and mother were feeding the young and teaching them to fly with a fine disregard of chilly temperature.

One morning we wakened and summer had come. Superfluous wraps were hastily discarded, doors and windows were set wide open, and nature, bestirring herself to some purpose, showed that she knew how to make a spurt and send her products on to market and ripen her grains for harvest.

The art of keeping cool when the days are hot and the nights breathless is an art worth studying. In winter, if the householder have a good supply of fuel, there is no trouble in keeping warm. But in summer it is a different proposition. Indiscretion in the matter of eating and drinking, as well as in the detail of clothing, has much to do with the prevalence of illness in summer. Heat prostrations and sunstroke incidental to a sudden rise in temperature and a continuous heated term might often be prevented, if only we could remember that there is no sense in treating the body as if it were a furnace, and heaping it up with burning coals when the thermometer marks ninety degrees.

Very little meat should be eaten in summer. A light diet of fruit, cereals, vegetables and milk, with plenty of cool but not iced water, would keep many people well who now suffer from attacks of quite preventable illness. Constant recourse to a soda fountain and copious draughts of ice-water reduce the physical temperature too rapidly, and in summer are fruitful causes of apparent sunstroke.

Some years ago a favorite singer who had a transatlantic fame died suddenly in Paris from the effects of a glass of ice-cold milk tossed off at a draught. Milk is a food and cannot be too highly appreciated, but it should be taken by the spoonful or in sips, not in a large quantity and in haste.

The body should be kept comfortable by frequent bathing, and as morning and evening are often much cooler than noon-tide, it is the part of prudence to carry a light wrap as a provision against a drop in the day's temperature. In the house, it is wise to avoid fuming and fretting about the heat. To go steadily on with one's work, as though one were perfectly comfortable, is the most effectual method of vanquishing the nervousness attendant on a sultry day. Whoever proceeds with the tasks in hand without talking about the heat and without delaying the work that must be done, will discover that accidents of heat or cold have little to do with real comfort. A house that is thoroughly aired in the morning, and either closed or darkened until the late afternoon, is likely to be agreeably cool even on a midsummer day. Fans are a luxury greatly prized by the contingent who enjoy using them, but it is doubtful whether the effort of fanning does not make one warmer than one would be if sitting still without exertion. In rooms that are disagreeably hot and dry, coolness may be induced by wringing out sheets in cold water and hanging them on a line stretched from one side of the room to the other. Little children should be lightly clad and frequently sponged with cool water, and a bath before bedtime will enable either child or grown person to sleep sweetly in forgetfulness of the heat.

The art of keeping cool implies self-control, keeping one's temper and cultivating philosophy. Anger, it has been well said, is not only a brief madness, but acts upon the blood as a virulent poison. No one can afford to indulge in the baleful excitement of anger during hot weather. Keep cool, let the provocation be what it may.

Equally futile and equally to be deprecated is needless worry. Nobody can keep cool who allows worry to eat like a moth into the very tissues of life. Moderation in everything, contentment with one's lot, resignation and patience are good prescriptions for keeping cool.

The Child Tsarevitch Alexis, Heir to the Russian Throne

THE little Tsarevitch, a beautiful and noble laddie of whom any mother might be proud, were she empress or peasant, has been called the only absolute monarch left in Russia. The heir to Russia's perturbed throne, around which dynamic forces are playing with ever-increasing menace, was long and patiently waited for. His little sisters came, each a disappointment, and composed a fair quartette before Alexis arrived to gladden the hearts of his parents and receive a welcome from the Russian people, who, notwithstanding widespread unrest, still preserve a traditional fealty to the reigning house. By the time the boy reaches his majority, brighter days may dawn for Russia, the time-worn despotisms of an absolute monarchy may have crumbled in the dust, and modern ideas of light and liberty may prevail. God grant it. The world is moving. Why should not the great empire of Russia move forward into the better day?

Living on $500 a Yea

CONTINUING the subject of good managem on small means, in which our readers are tal g a vital interest, we publish this week an ext ely helpful letter containing a chapter of personal expe nce. It is so sensible and straightforward that it may st l by itself:

Adhering to Strict Economy

At the time of our marriage I was engaged in a rical position under a five-year contract at $1,000 ear. Myself and wife had both been schooled in the t of economic living, and determined from the very t to lay by one-half of our income as the basis of a ture competency. This left us $500 on which to li and proved ample for a very comfortable subsistence fo ears to come, even with the addition of a baby boy, occ oat doctor's bills and other incidental expenses accon ny- ing such an arrival.

We rented a house at sixteen dollars per mont and reduced the rent by sub-leasing one room that ld not need. The few feet of unoccupied ground our back yard was an astonishment to our neighbors its productive possibilities, and did much to lesse our table expenses. Our purchases were always mad ith reference to need, utility and service. I never rem ber once having discussed the question, Can we affor ch and such a thing? Every transaction was deter ed by the mental query, Is it necessary or wise? Ther was always money in hand for the things needed, bu he line was drawn sharp on any expenditure that co be reviewed only with the thought that it was gon nd there was nothing left to show for it.

We never failed to recognize our obligation t he church and its various beneficent enterprises, bu d no tribute to theatres, athletic sports, fraternit or social clubs. Nor did any of the $500 go for tol co, cigars, liquors or soft drinks. We never bought goo on credit, or bought anything on the popular instal nt plan. The consequence was that we always knev t where we stood and what we had to do with; and f d no difficulty in keeping within our limit.

Meantime, the $4,000 I had saved previous to my r- riage was constantly growing, having no more infl ce upon our methods of living than if it were still g earned. I wish to emphasize the fact that it is r ely easier for the couple who enter upon married life on an income of only $500 a year to live within that in e than it is for the couple who have an income of $1,0 a year to live within $500, especially if they have a l e account of $4,000 to call upon at pleasure.

The secret of living comfortably on $500 a year s largely in avoiding needless and foolish expendit s. To those who make home the centre of attraction, d work together, it is surprising how much of real com t, happiness and true development may be derived f m the small salary of $500 a year. R. M.

Punctuality at Meals

So far as practicable, every household sho d be run on schedule time. People who indu e themselves in habitual tardiness at meals thr the machinery out of gear, impair the syst and block the way to good order and cheer f home life. A meal that is appetizing a palatable when cooked and set at once upon t table loses the fineness of its flavor if allow to grow cold while waiting for a loiterer, and effectually spoiled if put back in the oven a kept warm until somebody arrives thirty forty minutes after the hour. Of course, if o be unavoidably detained, every excuse may made for the dereliction, and the best that c be done in the emergency should be accepted both sides. But children and young peop ought to be trained to be punctual at mea The man of the house has a right to look for pleasantly appointed table and a well serv dinner or supper when he returns from his day work. Sometimes he is to blame, for he spen a final fifteen minutes or half hour on the roa instead of taking the first train for his home whe business is over. System properly adjusted enables th housekeeper to be a home-maker in the fullest meanin of the word.

GROWING CHILDREN

e Period When the Nervous Activity is at its Greatest.

A medical journal says:

"Against the practice of giving tea and fee to children we cannot speak too ongly.

Childhood is the period when the nervous tivity is at its greatest. The brain is ever sy receiving new impressions.

Reflex action, co-ordination of muscles, and e special senses are all under a special urse of training. The nervous system is shed to its utmost capacity, and long is the t of victims that follow its over-stimulation.

these little people, nothing but harm can me from the use of such articles as tea or ffee.

Bad, then, as this practice is, let us as ysicians be aggressive in its prohibition. o not be satisfied by answering "No" when ked as to its use, but let us teach the milies with whom we come in contact that ch practice is evil. We speak emphatically, cause not only among the poor and uneduted, but among the rich, who should know tter, this practice is marvelously prevalent."

A man who tried Postum Food Coffee said at it might be solid nourishment, but he dn't like its taste. He had not discovered e secret of making delicious Postum. After oiling commences, allow it to boil full 15 inutes. Not simply to put it on the stove r 15 minutes, but count the fifteen minutes ter boiling commences. That brings out e food value and the delicious flavor. It rtainly does make the children bright and ealthy, and has proven a Godsend to many adult whose daily ails were not understood ntil Postum was used in place of Coffee. There's a Reason." IN THE PUBLIC EYE

FEW Americans in recent years have received such an ovation from the British public as has been accorded to "Mark Twain" on his present trip to England. Mr. Clemens, as he is known in private life, went over primarily to receive the much coveted distinction of Doctor of Laws from Oxford University. The king, of the Japanese Emperor within a few weeks. He will be the Hon. Thomas J. O'Brien, who now represents our government at the court of the King of Denmark. At Copenhagen Mr. O'Brien ranks as a minister, so that the change of posts will be a promotion. He will have many problems to solve that will call for great tact and diplomatic skill. A new treaty is to be drawn up between the American and Japanese governments, and more or less friction arises at such a time, even between the most friendly nations. Mr. O'Brien was born in Michigan in 1842. He was admitted to the bar in 1864. He has been envoy to Denmark for the past three years.

high officials, the newspapers and the public at once began to make his visit a memorable one. King Edward invited him to a garden party at Windsor Castle, and Twain was the lion of the occasion. The famous "Pilgrims' Club" gave him a luncheon before he went up to Oxford from London. The hosts numbered one hundred and fifty, and included famous names on both sides of the Atlantic. The speech of introduction was made by Augustin Berrill, chief secretary for Ireland. He said that Samuel L. Clemens was known to all good men and women in both hemispheres, and to all boys and girls who are good for anything, as Mark Twain. The dead authors, he said, were a mighty army, but Mark Twain was the finest specimen of the living author. They all loved him and were there to tell him so.

At Oxford University the students cheered him whenever he appeared. Mr. Clemens, or Dr. Clemens, made an impressive picture in his crimson robe and doctor's cap.

THE ANTI-AMERICAN feeling which has been observable among a certain portion of the Japanese population seems to be subsiding. It is said that the present Japanese ambassador at Washington is to be recalled, and a former ambassador will take his place. The President is to send a new American representative to the court of the Japanese Emperor.

JUDGE L. R. WILFLEY, the American judge in Shanghai, has been giving the East an illustration of what a Western official can do in the way of cleaning up the moral conditions of a great commercial centre. Europeans or Americans, it must be remembered, are never tried by Chinese, but by judges appointed from their own country, who hold their own courts. The judge found that there were many disreputable lawyers making a living on cases brought into his court. He threw their cases out and warned the lawyers that they had better hang out their signs in some other city. They took the hint and departed. Next the judge got after the Shanghai gambling dens and other resorts for gilded vice, and there was a general cleaning up. The East, it would seem, relaxes the moral backbone of the men from the other side of the world, and the judge has decided that if we want Western civilization to teach much to the Oriental, there must be a change in the way the Westerners behave in treaty ports.

CONVERSION OF A GOVERNOR

JACKSON, Miss., has been the scene of a remarkable revival recently. One of the converts is Hon. James K. Vardaman, Governor of the State. Yielding to the entreaties of those who surrounded him at one of the meetings, Governor Vardaman knelt at the altar at the revival services on Tuesday evening, June 25, thus announcing to the large assemblage his acceptance of Christ as an all-sufficient Saviour.

Rev. Dr. Cates, a noted Southern evangelist, who has been heralded as the successor of the late Sam Jones, was in charge of the services.

In solemn tones, Governor Vardaman followed the words of Dr. Cates, repeating each word in a loud tone, plainly to be heard in every part of the auditorium: "I surrender all to Jesus, for salvation and service." Hundreds of women and men wept for joy.

The Governor was led back to the rear of the hall and shook hands with twenty-nine other converts.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—AFTER FIVE WEEKS of intense suffering from endocarditis and other complications, Mrs. J. Wilbur Chapman passed to her eternal rest early Tuesday morning, June 25, at her home at Winona Lake, Ind. Her husband, the noted evangelist, was ill at the same time from blood poisoning brought on as a result of an operation. Great fear was felt by his friends that the shock of his wife's death would result seriously on his weakened constitution. The funeral of Mrs. Chapman was held at Albany, N. Y.

COULDN'T KEEP IT
Kept It Hid From the Children

"We cannot keep Grape-Nuts food in the house. It goes so fast I have to hide it, because the children love it so. It is just the food I have been looking for ever so long; something that I do not have to stop to prepare and still is nourishing."

Grape-Nuts is the most scientifically made food on the market. It is perfectly and completely cooked at the factory and can be served at an instant's notice, either with rich cold cream, or with hot milk if a hot dish is desired. When milk or water is used, a little sugar should be added, but when cold cream is used alone, the natural grape-sugar, which can be seen glistening on the granules, is sufficiently sweet to satisfy the palate. This grape-sugar is not poured over the granules, as some people think, but exudes from the granules in the process of manufacture, when the starch of the grains is changed from starch to grape-sugar by the process of manufacture. This, in effect, is the first act of digestion; therefore, Grape-Nuts food is pre-digested and is most perfectly assimilated by the very weakest stomach. "There's a reason."

OUR DUTIES TO MEN

International Sunday School Lesson for July 21

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

MAN is not born to die, but to live forever, and to serve God and do good in both worlds. The longest psalm in the Bible is an ingenious acrostic, in which ten names of the law of Sinai, namely: Way, word, truth, law, statutes, judgments, precepts, commandments, testimonies, ordinances, are used, as ten strings of a harp on which the writer praises God for his love expressed in the moral law, on which he lavishes as much enthusiasm as the naturalist upon the wonders of nature's lesser laws.

"Honor thy father and thy mother." This is called "the first commandment with promise." The promised reward for obedience to this command is long life on the earth. We are writing this lesson just as we are leaving Japan for China, in both of which countries reverence and honor for parents has become a superstitious worship of their ghosts. The names of deceased ancestors are put on wooden tablets resembling miniature gravestones, which are set on a mantel-piece, and before these all members of the family bow and pray every day. In Japan they worship not only family ancestors but tribal ancestors and the imperial ancestors. Reverence for parents goes too far, for boys inherit not only the property and honor of a diligent father, but the debts and punishment of an unfaithful one. A native missionary preacher of great ability, in the Japanese city in which this lesson is written, inherited a debt of five hundred dollars when he returned from school in America, and with a salary barely enough to live upon finds it next to impossible to pay the debt. But if reverence for parents goes too far in Asia it certainly falls short in many homes in America.

In North Carolina was a farmer who had a bright boy. He had a poor farm, but the poor farmer worked and scraped until he was able to send that boy to the State University. The boy did well, and his letters home delighted his father's and mother's hearts, and they felt well paid for all their sacrifice. But after a while the father said to his wife, "Mother, I can't stand it any longer; I just must see that boy." It was a long drive to the University and as he drew near he thought, "Well, won't the boy be surprised? He don't know I am coming. Won't he be delighted to see his old father?" He was driving up the hill to the college when he saw his boy coming down with some gay college companions. He jumped out, and said, "Oh, my boy, my son!" The son was ashamed of his poor old father and straightened himself up and said, "There must be some mistake, sir; you are not my father. I don't know you." I am told that father turned round with a broken heart and went home to die. "Honor thy father and thy mother." "Obey your parents in the Lord."

It is recorded of a certain great philosopher that a friend who went to visit him met the philosopher's little daughter before he met the philosopher himself. Knowing that the father was such a deeply learned man, he thought that the little girl must have learned something very grave, something very deep from such a father, and he said to her, "What is your father teaching you?" The little maid looked at him with her clear blue eyes, and just said, "Obedience." It is the great lesson for childhood in the home, to learn to obey parents as a preparation to obey God and the laws of the State.

"Thou shalt not kill" is interpreted in the New Testament when it is rendered, "Thou shalt do no murder." Of course killing is not murder except when done with malice aforethought. And Jesus teaches that we are murderers even if we do not kill, if we desire to do so. "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." The following is from a personal letter from Ernest Thompson-Seton on the "Moral Nature of Animals," or "The Natural History of the Ten Commandments": "It may interest you to know that I find the foundation, or at least faint recognitions of the last six commandments as natural laws among the animals, but so far no trace of the first four. The deepest laid of all in animal nature is the

"There are a great many ways of stealand a great many things can be besides money. A girl who got at school for work which she had from a classmate's exercise stole things; what were they? A boy who crowded car pretended to pay his fare but nothing in; a messenger boy who the time for which he was paid in marbles on the sidewalk; the en who every morning picked up and nuts from the boxes at the ry doors; any one who gets anything tle dishonest tricks, breaks this comment, and is likely to go on from thefts to great ones."

A good illustration of the command"Thou shalt not steal," which the Testament expands into its fuller ing, "Defraud not," is the following

A Missionary's Sermon

One years ago a missionary had been hing on an island, the principal proof which is the clam. One day he reid an unexpected compliment as to horoughness of his spiritual work. The man was working in his shirt sleeves new church. A stout sea captain him: "Are you the minister here?" Y, sir." "Well, I've got ten dollars ou." "For the church?" "No, for self. I like your way of doing things I've come to this island for clams a many years, and always found them sand or fifteen hundred short when I home. It will pay me to have you preaching doctrines which make count their clams honestly."

"Thou shalt not bear false witness st thy neighbor." For those who are ersuaded that it is better to trust the than to trust a lie when it seems to cessary to tell a lie to save life, the ving story is pertinent: Dr. Adoni Judson and his noble wife had been e years in Burma as missionaries suddenly a storm burst over them. Burmese war broke out, and the rican teachers were suspected of spies. One day—June 8, 1824—as the Judsons were preparing for r, a Burmese officer rushed into the followed by a dozen men. "You alled by the king," he cried out; and diately one of the men seized Mr. on and bound him with a rope. y," exclaimed his wife; "I will give money." "Take her, too," said the r; "she also is a foreigner." This t, however, was not fulfilled; but Mrs. Judson had the agony of seeing husband hurried off to prison. Hopsecure better treatment for her hus and the other prisoners, Mrs. Judson large sums to the governor of the Some time afterwards officers were by the king to confiscate the Judsons' erty, and amount had been given to the gov. Mrs. Judson told them honestly, hey demanded the sum from the gov. Of course the governor was furi at having to refund the money, and tened to throw all the prisoners into nner or death prison. Mrs. Judson to him to implore favor for her hus and friends. "Why did you tell the 's treasurer how much money you ?" he cried angrily. "He asked me," Mrs. Judson, simply; "what else could ?" "Say that you had given me ing, and I would have made the teach comfortable in prison." "But I can tell a falsehood. The governor's was sitting by his side, and listening interest as Mrs. Judson spoke. "Very " she cried; "what else could she done? I like such straightforward uct. You must not be angry with From that time the governor's wife a firm friend to Mrs. Judson until Dr. on was set free.

How personal the Ten Commandments are! God proclaims them for millions, yet speaks to each individual conscience: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." "Thou shalt not commit adultery." "Thou shalt not covet."

A Pronoun Religion

Christianity has been called a pronoun religion, because it is so full of the "I" and "thou" of personal intercourse between God and the individual man. In this impersonal age, when men seek to hide from responsibility in corporations that have no souls and in organizations that work by platoons and use the pronoun "we" instead of the individual "I," God still thunders his laws into the ear and conscience of the individual. "Thou shalt love." "Thou shalt not bear false witness." This personal address was never more needed than at this time when we so often exalt inclination above conscience.

"Thou shalt not covet." Except the first commandment all thus far have enjoined or forbidden outward acts of word and deed. The tenth goes to the root of the second table. To put God first, that will prevent idolatry, image worship, profaning of God's name and day. And so if covetousness be kept out of the heart, that is, evil desires, whether they point toward theft or murder or adultery, then we shall also escape the evil deeds that grow out of a bad heart. Covetousness is the heart sin especially condemned, not only in the Decalogue but also in the preaching of Christ—a sin that no one confesses, and yet probably the commonest of sins. Except hypocrisy, largely an outgrowth of it, there is nothing Christ so sternly rebukes as covetousness, which we now call commercialism.

Early Patriots

Professor Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton University, in his little book on The Americanism of Washington, says: "I hear John Dickinson saying: 'It is not our duty to leave wealth to our children, but it is our duty to leave liberty to them. We have counted the cost of this contest, and we find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery.' I see Samuel Adams, impoverished, living upon a pittance, hardly able to provide a decent coat for his back, rejecting with scorn the offer of office, wealth, a title even, to win him from his allegiance to the cause of America. I see Robert Morris, the wealthy merchant, opening his purse and pledging his credit to support the Revolution, and later devoting all his fortune and energy to restore and establish the financial honor of the Republic, with the memorable words, 'The United States may command all that I have, except my integrity.'"

God has a wonderful plan in the natural arrangements of society for developing out of individual selfishness a world-wide altruism. Only a few have reached it, but great progress has been made since it was considered almost a duty to hate and fight all foreigners.

The first of the circles of love, by which men are being weaned from selfishness, is the "home circle"—Lamartine's trinity, the father, the mother, and the child, each of whom is drawn out of self, as the tides are drawn by sun and moon, by the loves of the other two. Then comes the larger circle of neighborhood love, developed by the sympathy of a family for other families close at hand, to whom have come like joys and sorrows. No one comes near us or across us, but it is through an intention of God that we may help, soothe, or cheer him." Then comes the larger circle of love for one's own city, where patriotism begins—and, with some, ends. It should and usually does extend in some degree to one's State—and there the patriotism of others halts. In many hearts, however, the next circle, love of country, is intenser than any but the family love. But love for man should not stop with patriotism in that narrow spirit that said, "Beyond the map of France my heart can travel not." There are few humanitarians so true as He who was the embodiment of perfect manhood, thus to the fullest extent "a citizen of the world." In him the circles of love ceased not till they reached the uttermost shores of humankind. "God loved the world," and the Godlike man will likewise love all men.

Concluded from last week

THE next day, the start having been delayed because of the necessity for providing a fresh supply of food for man and beast, Normu and her husband set out, followed by personal attendants and the men with the pack mules. A detour was made to take in the Sera Monastery, where Muna was staying by courtesy of the monks, who had given up their monastery to her on this her initial visit of state to the capital.

It had been heralded that the reincarnated abbess would travel with her parents as far as her nunnery; but, in reality, Muna was going all the way to the border. She had seen India for the first time the summer before, when, yielding to the entreaties of her nuns and other devotees, permission had been granted her by the divine ruler to go there to re-perform an ancient miracle. A well of sweetest water, one of the prized possessions of her nunnery in the Chumbi Valley, had dried up. It was known that the water for the well had been started on its course under the mountains by Khan-dro-ye, the original, who made a pilgrimage to India for the purpose, and pressed her palm on the surface of a certain spring, turning its waters to the land of her birth.

Muna could not turn back the waters, but she spent two weeks in the palace of the Maharajah, and, in the enchanting surroundings, she had been tempted to depart, just a little, from the rigid exclusiveness which her sanctity demanded. The young abbess had a human streak and she had dreamed and pondered since her return to her bleak highland.

Srong-tsan and Normu straightened up proudly on their high saddles, as their daughter came out of the monastery in her robe of yellow brocade, attended by her nuns and guardsmen. The abbess was slightly above medium height and slender, with a face both intellectual and beautiful, not disfigured by staining, as was that of her mother and other matrons, but pale ivory in complexion, the cheeks showing a faint rose bloom. Her black hair hung in two long braids falling in front over her shoulders, but, instead of the gold fillet, she wore the high headdress of the province wherein lay her nunnery, her aureole differing, however, from that of the laywomen in being composed of a yellow silken katag, or sacred scarf, and profusely ornamented with tiny plates of gold, each inscribed with a letter of the mantra.

A yellow-robed lama, a holy man from her parents' train, assisted Muna to mount her thoroughbred pony. She sat astride, after the fashion of her countrywomen, and, like her mother and the other ladies of rank, was soon so muffled in rugs that her peculiar method of riding and her identity were concealed.

As Normu trotted her pony by the side of her daughter, Muna strove to divert her mother's mind from thoughts of impending disaster.

"See how the golden roof of the Potala glistens under the bright sun. Can we not borrow for our spirits a little something of its glow?" said the young girl.

"I examined the merchandise this morning, and found everything in good condition," said Srong-tsan, who rode on the other side of his daughter. "The yak butter, in its year-old skins, will make the mouths of our southern friends water, and the Hindustanis have never before seen such rugs and goat-hair as we are carrying them this season."

"I sincerely hope that all will not turn to vilest vermin before we get them into the hands of our customers," sighed Normu, as she shifted her reins to her left hand in order to turn with her right the small prayer-wheel which dangled from her girdle.

"That fate is reserved, according to Droche, for the knave Lupi," said Srong-tsan, laughing. "She has already predicted the next coming of his soul."

"Speaking of Droche, reminds me of the yak-tail. Did she deliver my message to you?" inquired Muna.

"Yes, and your father selected the finest one in the lot and had affixed to it a silver handle wrought into the image of a tea-churn. The young rajah cannot fail to be pleased with it," replied Normu.

The abbess' face took on a pensive expression, and she lapsed into silence.

For a week the company traveled without accident, spending the nights under their yak-hair tents or at the home of some acquaintance in a prosperous town. When Muna's nunnery was reached, every trumpet and drum in its gompa sounded, and nuns with smiling faces, accompanied by a train of interesting novices, came out to welcome back the abbess.

There were tears in Muna's eyes when, after resting two days at the nunnery, she rejoined the commercial party. She had dismissed her guardsmen and nuns with the exception of one holy sister. The whole proceeding was unheard of—an abbess traveling across the mountains with no pretext but the gratification of a worldly desire and the appearance without churchly escort. The young girl hesitated, as though about to turn back, when the road began to ascend from the valley, but, catching her mother's questioning look, brightened up and talked of the herdsmen.

"I shall enjoy being in the tents on the hills," she said, with refreshing girlishness.

"His Holiness was loath to grant you this boon, but I dearly love to travel and, to me, it seemed so natural for you to crave this one trip. I can exercise no authority over you, but surely, my daughter, you will not forget who you are," whispered Normu, in alarm.

"Can you not dismiss those gloomy forebodings, mother? I will not believe that harm awaits you. The Master taught purity of living, and, if we can be good, there must be a divine source of good, and the source of all good is unquestionably as mighty as the powers of evil," said Muna, as she resumed her dignified demeanor.

"You are beginning to talk strangely on these subjects, Muna. Our religion teaches us that there is much to fear from the immortal spirits," said Normu, as she prepared to fall behind for the purpose of forming single file, so that everyone might pass to the left of a cairn surmounted by a prayer flag, erected to exorcise the particular demon presiding over the approach to a stream, which was sometimes treacherously swollen.

The abbess was not the only one who enjoyed the days spent on the pasturelands. The grass was luxuriant, and there were ferns, too, peeping out from crevices in rocks, and larkspur and great patches of mustard flower. Everybody was safe, Rugyen, the younger of Normu's husbands, the flocks of shawl-goats and herds of milch yaks, and all the herdsmen and buttermakers. Chempo, Droche's betrothed, was with them, and the maid was as much relieved as her mistress to find no trace of malicious witchery.

Droche was a pleasant-faced girl, shockingly unclean in appearance, as were all others in her station, but very comely in the eyes of Chempo. Lupi, too, admired Droche, and, being Chempo's youngest brother, he would become one of her three husbands. Lupi was drunken and the maid despised him.

Besides serving as maid to her mistress, Droche prepared meals for the lama who made one of the company, cooking to his taste the eggs, which formed so important a part of the menu, and churning his tea with an extra bit of salt and a generous supply of butter. The priestly counselor had profited a good deal in a financial way through his fully. "The course of my life was red without my will, but I knew the marked out for me and I should have tampered with temptation."

Had your parents or your ruler, ipotent as he claims to be, the right it you off from happiness?" asked Senim.

"There is a happiness other than that which comes with love and marriage," answered Muna.

"Will you be content with it, my Muna?" questioned Senim, softly.

"Speak not to me of contentment. It is duty. The word staggers me, but I cannot escape it. I owe duty to my parents, my uncle, and my brothers. Must I bury them in shame and bring upon them the relentless wrath of the Dalai Lama? To him, I shall have committed sacrilege, betraying the holy thing which he imagines has found lodging in me."

"Your mother has powers of diplomacy, and the ruler of Tibet can find empty chests in his treasury," suggested Senim.

"I beg you, do not urge me. Let me return to my people. You have said that I can do nothing, but I can sow seed, and, if the blood of a martyr water the field, I should not murmur; for so fared the Holy One whom you worship."

"The Christ was not a woman, delicate, irresistibly charming, and created only to be caressed and protected."

"Still, women have labored."

"Stronger than yours must be the arm," said Senim, as he drew closer to her.

"If my parents had only loved India as I do!" moaned Muna, burying her face in her hands.

"Upon your love for me I base my right," whispered Senim, bending over her. "Be comforted, Muna. Bigotry and superstition have erected stout barriers, but my beauteous flower shall not pine away in the chill north."

Terrible was the shock to Normu, and accursed, she declared, was the hour when she had ventured forth without the observant Srong-tsan. She was dotingly fond of her daughter, however, and Ailee could so effectively place in juxtaposition an abbess, with a bleeding heart, and a Maharani, happily wedded.

Muna married and Droche and Chempo staid with her, the maid begging the privilege, partly from love for her young mistress, and chiefly to rid herself of Lupi. Leaving Muna where foreign gods could be invoked to save her from the awful punishment for apostasy, Normu Sala went back to brave humiliation, and death, if need be, and the coming again as a loathsome insect.

Tibet was aghast, and six months passed before the Dalai Lama would consent to enter upon a consideration of the matter. To his mind, all became perfectly clear. When the juniper twigs ceased to burn, the soul of Khan-dro-ye could not abide in a daughter of the house of Sala, and it passed out, subject to the same conditions that would have obtained in case of Muna's death. Relieved of the soul of the abbess through no fault of her own, the young girl was on a level with other women, and, not choosing celibacy, was at liberty to marry.

THE END

The Czar as a Poet

In the course of a recent address in London, Captain Gervais Lyons told this incident concerning the Czar's literary aspirations:

"I must say just a few words about the Czar. Here are some lines of his Russian poetry, translated into English:

"My happiness was born at night,
And suckled in the gloom;
My pleasures have dissolved in flight,
Heart-stricken at my doom.
My soul strives blindly for relief,
Chilled as by drifting snow,
By doubts which mock at the belief
Of finding peace below.

"Truly a veritable cry of the heart. Many examples can be cited to show his great kindness, and he is never so happy as in the bosom of his family, whom he dearly loves—away from the troubles and turmoils of State duties."

Your personal appearance must be either an aid or a hindrance to you—which is it? Do wrinkles, sallowness or a double chin make you look older than you should? To-day it is possible, with a little care, for a woman to overcome the results of neglect or unnatural living. All that is required is a few minutes' massage occasionally with

Pompeian Massage Cream

Then wrinkles disappear, the sallowness gives way to a clear, rosy complexion, and the flesh becomes firm. There is no mystery, nothing miraculous about it. Pompeian Massage Cream simply aids the natural action of the pores and blood vessels, which brings back natural conditions and the natural inherent beauty of the skin. It is not a cosmetic, contains no grease, will not promote the growth of hair.

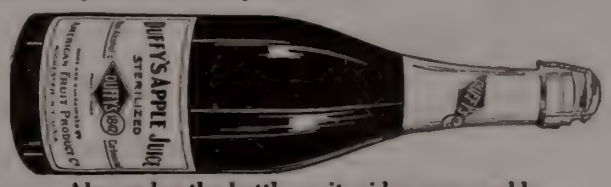
All the Goodness of the Apple

All the strength, nutriment and juice of two apples is concentrated in every ounce of Duffy's 1842 Apple Juice; all the skin, fibre and waste is eliminated. It is made by a secret process which prevents fermentation and makes it impossible for alcohol to develop. It is sterilized to remove all impurities, and the rich, original flavor of the apple is carbonated, which renders it still more pleasant.

Duffy's Apple Juice

contains all the phosphates and food values of the apple. It is a pleasant, sparkling tonic drink. It enriches the blood, builds up the tissues and gives energy and vitality to the entire system.



Always lay the bottle on its side---serve cold.

Non-Alcoholic — Sterilized — Effervescent

Rev. Ira Van Allen, Pastor Reformed Church, Syracuse, N.Y., writes: "I find it not only non-alcoholic and medicinal, but a very pleasant and refreshing drink. I consider it the very best spring tonic in fact other so-called tonics are not to be compared with it. Its liberal use at this season of the year will purify the blood and revive the entire system. I trust it will meet with the extensive demand it merits."

Duffy's 1842 Apple Juice does away with any craving for alcoholic stimulants and is universally recommended by Clergymen and Physicians as a refreshing and health-giving beverage which may be drunk at meals or at any time with perfect freedom.

Duffy's Grape Juice, a guaranteed pure, unfermented and absolutely non-alcoholic beverage. A pleasant and healthy drink.

Duffy's Mother Goose booklet, illustrated in colors, free to all children who write for it.

AMERICAN FRUIT PRODUCT CO., 78 White St., Rochester, N.Y.

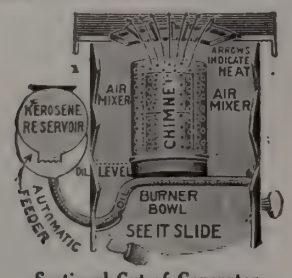
Burns Barrels of Air

Nothing Else Like it—New, Remarkable Stove Consumes 395 Barrels of Air to One Gallon Common Kerosene Oil, Making Oil Gas, the New Fuel that Looks and Burns Like Gas—The Most Wonderful Stove Ever Invented

Causing great excitement wherever exhibited. Fuel drawn principally from atmosphere. Uses 395 barrels of air while consuming one gallon of oil. Wood, coal and oil cost money. Only free fuel is air. Supply unlimited. No trust in control. Air belongs to rich and poor alike.



Sectional Cut of Generator

Harrison's Valveless, Wickless Automatic Oil-Gas and Air-Burning Stove

Automatically generates gas from kerosene oil, mixing it with air. Burns like gas. Intense hot fire. Combustion perfect. To operate turn knob—oil runs into burner; touch a match, it generates gas, which passes through air mixer, drawing in about a barrel of air to every large spoonful of oil consumed. That's all. It is self-regulating—no more attention. Same heat all day or all night. For more or less heat, simply turn knob. There it remains until you come again. To put fire out, turn knob, raising burner; oil runs back into can, fire's out. As near perfection as anything in this world. No dirt, soot or ashes. No leaks, nothing to clog or close up. No wick—not even a valve, yet heat is under perfect control. Objectionable features of all other stoves wiped out.

Nothing Like Those Sold in Stores

D. E. Carn, Ind., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stoves are worth more than twice as much as they cost. It costs me only 1½ cents a day for fuel."

L. S. Norris, Vt., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel, at least 50 per cent. to 75 per cent. over wood and coal."

E. D. Arnold, Neb., writes: "Saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. My range cost me $5.50 per month, and the Harrison only $1.25 per month."

Objectionable features of all other stoves wiped out. Not like those sold in stores. Ideal for cooking, roasting, baking, ironing, canning fruit, picnics, cottages, camping; also for heating houses, stores, rooms, etc., with radiating attachment. No more carrying coal, kindling, ashes, soot and dirt. No hot, fiery kitchens. Absolutely safe from explosion. Not dangerous like gasoline. Simple, durable—last for years. Saves expense, drudgery and fuel bills.

All sizes. Prices low—$3.25 and up. Sent to any address. Send no money—only send your name and address. Write to-day for our 30-day trial offer. Full description—thousands of testimonials. 1907 Proposition. Catalogue Free.

Violations of Law*

IN this country more than others there is need of impressing on young people the duty embodied in the fifth commandment. A man will toil and save and deny himself to give his children a better education than he had, and when they are taught, they are sure to be tempted to be ashamed of his mistakes in grammar, his ignorant talk, and his unrefined ways. They forget only too often that their knowledge was gained at the cost of his self-sacrifice. On the other hand, one meets occasionally with a tribute which speaks well for a true appreciation of the commandment. One such was that of a boy who acted as guide over the mountains to a party of tourists. The sharp stones cut his bare feet and the tourists gave him money to buy a pair of shoes. On their return, the boy was still barefoot and they asked him what he had done with the money. "I gave it to my mother," he said; "she needed the shoes worse than I did."

The whole country is horror-stricken at the disclosures at Boise, Idaho. Orchard acknowledges killing nineteen men, and says he was paid to do it. Every one loathes such a man and the men who hired him, yet the world honors the soldier who also is paid to kill, and justifies the government that hires him.

A scoffer, whose moral character was utterly bad, reproached a minister of the Gospel with the difficulties and apparent contradictions that he professed to have discovered in the Bible. "I cannot understand the book," he said. The minister replied: "Yet there are some things quite plain and simple; why not begin with those and wait for further light on the difficulties?" "Tell me one," said the scoffer. "Well, in your case, for the sake of your family, and for the sake of those whom you are trying to ruin, I would recommend you to begin with the seventh commandment. There is no doubt what that means."

The last three commandments are linked together so that the man who breaks one is almost certain to break the other two. He who begins to covet another man's possessions is very liable to end by stealing them. He will, if he is a man in good society, do his stealing under cover of the law, so as to escape the courts; but, as every day proves, there are many thieves that the law does not touch who will have eventually to give account of legal frauds that they have committed. Very early, and all through such dishonorable careers, the lie is resorted to, to avert punishment and to cover up the sin that eventually comes out.

Poverty of Spirit†

PEOPLE listening to Christ as he preached his first sermon must have been astonished at his placing this characteristic at the entrance to his kingdom. The world had not been accustomed to hear a benediction pronounced on poverty of any kind, especially poverty of spirit. There were then, as there still are, associations accounted very desirable, into which none can enter but the rich. Clubs, societies and even churches there are into which the poor may not enter. The young teacher coming to tell the world the character of the kingdom of heaven reverses all this. He declares that the poor in spirit are blessed, for it is they who inherit the kingdom of heaven.

A statement so original deserves to be thoroughly considered. We are here for only a short time, but the kingdom of heaven is eternal. We might well be indifferent to our state here, if we may possess that kingdom. This then is over the entrance gate: "The poor in spirit, theirs is the kingdom." If that is so, it is no wonder that Christ called them "blessed." There was sound philosophy in the assertion. There is no better way into a good thing, even in this world, than poverty of spirit. What could a teacher do with a child that came to him in a proud and haughty spirit? The child must know that he is ignorant and needs to learn, must be humble and teachable, poor in spirit, before he can learn anything. The apprentice to a trade, who thinks he knows it all, will never succeed. The farmer laughs at the city man who takes a farm and proposes to work it on scientific principles; he knows what the end of that project will be. The beginner must be conscious of his mental poverty. That is Christ's rule. Not the philosopher, not the theologian, but the child, the one willing to learn of him, will become heavenly-minded.

Nor does the man poor in spirit have to wait till he gets to heaven for the blessing. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom, not will be. The kingdom of heaven is present with him in this life. It is his possession now. He is in the learner's class, he is ready to receive what Christ will teach him. He comes not as the critic to examine and to test, but as the child to receive. Christ demands faith. His followers must trust him, as the child trusts his father and his teacher, as the soldier trusts his general and the sailor his captain. Humility, confidence, obedience—those are the keys that unlock the heavenly treasury. He that will humble himself shall be exalted, not only in rank but in knowledge and heavenly-mindedness.

Christian Duties

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IN the Lord's Prayer we are taught to pray first in God's interests, and secondly in our own, and thus the first four of the Ten Commandments concern our direct duty to him, the last six concern our duty to man. The first of these—i.e., the fifth commandment—treats of our relations to our earthly parents: "Honor thy father and thy mother." God has made no exception of unworthy parents or unconverted parents; our duty is the same to them, whatever they may be to us.

It not unfrequently happens that a converted son or daughter has much to suffer at home through the misunderstanding of unconverted parents; and too often they think it is a sufficient reason for leaving home and seeking a life of less suffering and reproach among such as understand them. This is in direct opposition to this command of our God.

But it is a blessed thing when a son or daughter can stand fire, not only in the open persecution of former friends, but the bitter poisoned darts of those nearest to them. There is a Christlikeness in obeying the many apparently needless requirements which are often obviously arranged on purpose to hinder the child in some precious service directly for the Master. It needs real practical faith to recognize under such circumstances that "all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8: 28), and at the same time to be firm as a rock about those things in which principle is involved.

A daughter, who is ready to renounce a religious meeting which she had counted on, to please a captious mother by doing some household duty which could have been done just as easily at another time, has a right to say to that mother, when she insists on her going to the theatre or to some worldly amusement, "No, dear mother, I can give up my will, but I cannot give up God's will, and I cannot follow Jesus to the theatre." A converted son, who, for conscience towards God, will work to the utmost requirements of his unconverted father to help him in business, even though he must thereby deny himself the spiritual pleasure which his heart longs for, will be in a position to speak with God's authority about anything in the business which is contrary to his will, fraud, Sunday work, or whatever it may be. "So is the will of God that with well-doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men" (I. Pet. 2: 15).

"Thou shall do no murder," has been explained by our blessed Lord to include anger and hard names against a brother; he warns us against the sin of attempting to hold communion with God while we are not on good terms with our brethren; "first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift" (see Matt. 5: 22-26). Let a child of God give way to a bitter or jealous thought about a brother, and then to prayer, he will be conscious of uneasiness or restlessness, a want of concentration; the enemy has come in and the stillness of the open window and the stillness of the soul is broken by his presence. Things are not in their right order. "First be reconciled to thy brother," go and cast him the evil, unworthy thoughts that you have been thinking about him, and then come and offer thy gift." "Yes," you say, "but he would not think me capable of doing so, and I should sink in his estimation." Perhaps you would, but is not anything preferable to maintaining an appearance which is untrue? If there is a man living in the light of God's love will honor you as he never did before, and an unhindered flow of communion with God will set in upon your soul. All that is against love is in violation of this command. As God's Levites, let our vocation "to bless in the name of the Lord" (Deut. 10: 8, 9); let us follow our vocation, and him who called us to it.

RHEUMATISM Relieved Without Medicine

No Pills, No Tablets—Only the External Application—and you wait until you get

Relief Before You Pay

Don't take medicine for Rheumatism but send your name and address to the makers of Magic Foot Drafts, the great Michigan Remedy which is relieving almost every case and condition of this dread disease without internal medicine of any kind whatsoever. Return mail will bring you the Drafts, which are worn on the footsoles, as shown. An illustrated book, which comes free with the Drafts, explains fully the wonderful theory of this external treatment and explains the causes of Rheumatism, which all should avoid.

These Drafts are relieving almost every stage of this cruel disease, including even chronic cases of 30 and 40 years' standing which were considered incurable, as well as all the milder stages. No matter how discouraged you have become, we have such confidence in our Drafts that we gladly send them free and prepaid. Then if you are satisfied with the benefit received from them, you can send us one dollar. If not, they cost you nothing whatever. You decide. You can see that nothing but a genuine remedy could be sold in such a way, as the benefit must come before the pay. An Opportunity for the Man with a Dollar in

A Great Manufacturing Centre

The Rapid Industrial Growth of Trenton, America's Historic City, Affords an Unusually Favorable Real Estate Investment

MUCH of the glorious history of our country clusters about the City of Trenton. The mere mention of the name "Trenton" revives patriotic memories. From the earliest dawn of Colonial times, Trenton has been one of the finest and most important cities in America.

This is not an historic sketch, although it is difficult to write about Trenton without lapsing into historic romance.

The first recorded history of the present site of Trenton shows the solitude of the Lenape Indian wigwams, invaded by the Dutch and Swede pelfry traders in 1664. Later a Quaker colony that developed into Trent's town (Trenton), named in honor of the wealthy Scotchman, William Trent, and in 1776 the centre of our Revolutionary history, when the struggle for our national independence was fought and won.

The history of Trenton for the past 75 years is largely the record of commercial development and steady growth to what is now one of the most thriving manufacturing cities of the entire East.

As the capital city of the wealthy State of New Jersey (one of the few States entirely free from debt) and the natural junction point of the various railroad and shipping interests that centre here, it affords facilities for manufacturing enterprises that few other cities enjoy.

Industries of International Fame

More than $40,000,000.00 is invested in Trenton's industries, employing over 25,000 people daily, paying out each month a little over $1,000,000 in wages. (This does not include State officers or salaries paid by stores and dealers.)

Trenton's industries affect the world's commerce at large.

Here is the immense Roebling steel wire and cable plant—the world's greatest wire industry, covering over 35 acres—builders of the famous Brooklyn Bridge, Niagara Suspension Bridge and other great cable bridges of the world, employing nearly 6,000 people, with a monthly pay roll of over $500,000.00.

The Trenton Potteries Company, whose output in 1906 was over $7,000,000.00 and whose wares are known and used in both continents, employ over 5,000 people. The total pottery industries of Trenton produce almost $12,000,000.00 a year.

There are 10 rubber works here, and the largest linoleum and oilcloth works in the world, with hundreds of other important industries.

Unusually favorable shipping facilities by river, canals and railroads, making low freight rates, are largely responsible for constantly attracting to Trenton some of the largest and most important manufacturing industries of the country.

Trenton is one of the 4 heaviest freight shipping cities of the great Pennsylvania R.R. system.

This rapid industrial development has brought a corresponding increase of population. The city is rapidly expanding, following its newly added industries each year—in an easterly direction along the Pennsylvania R.R. to a healthy residence section, with beautiful wide streets adjoining the Penna. R.R. car shops, where over 600 men are employed, and within easy access of other of Trenton's most important industries.

For those employed in the East End industries, East Trenton Heights is the natural residential section, only 15 minutes from the heart of the city, with good trolley service at 5-cent fare.

It is within a stone's throw of a number of Trenton's most important industrial plants and within easy access of all by trolley, with fare of 6 tickets for 25 cents. It is the place for men to live who want profitable employment 330 days in the year.

Homes erected here will have the advantage of all city conveniences—gas, water, sewers, electric light, mail delivery, churches of all denominations and good schools.

Every lot fronts on a beautiful street 50 feet wide.

All street improvements, including the planting of shade trees, have been made, free of expense to property owners.

Lots are 25x130 feet (a few larger) and are sold under permanent restrictions as a residence section, with no factory sites, to white people only.

A Profitable Investment

In view of the rapid increase in Trenton real estate during recent years, the present low price at which these lots are offered will seem insignificant a few years hence.

For the opening sale, the price of lots in East Trenton Heights has been placed at the remarkably low price of from $55 to $95.

Corner lots are $15 extra, sold only with 2 adjoining lots.

These prices are subject to a discount of 10 per cent. for all cash, or the lots may be purchased on small payments of $1 down and $1 weekly per lot.

There will be no taxes until January 1, 1909.

No interest.

No mortgages.

No charge for deed.

Free and perfect title guarantee, and

Free deed to your heirs if you die before payments are completed.

Such an opportunity to secure a home site or a good investment in one of the country's greatest industrial cities is not likely to occur soon again.

These lots should be worth many times present prices even before payments are completed by those who purchase on the easy-payment and saving's-habit plan.

Lots all around this section have more than doubled during the past six months.

The low price of East Trenton Heights lots is possible because the property was acquired by the company developing it before the city trolley was extended to it—ahead of improvements and building of factories.

Industrial City Real Estate is Attractive

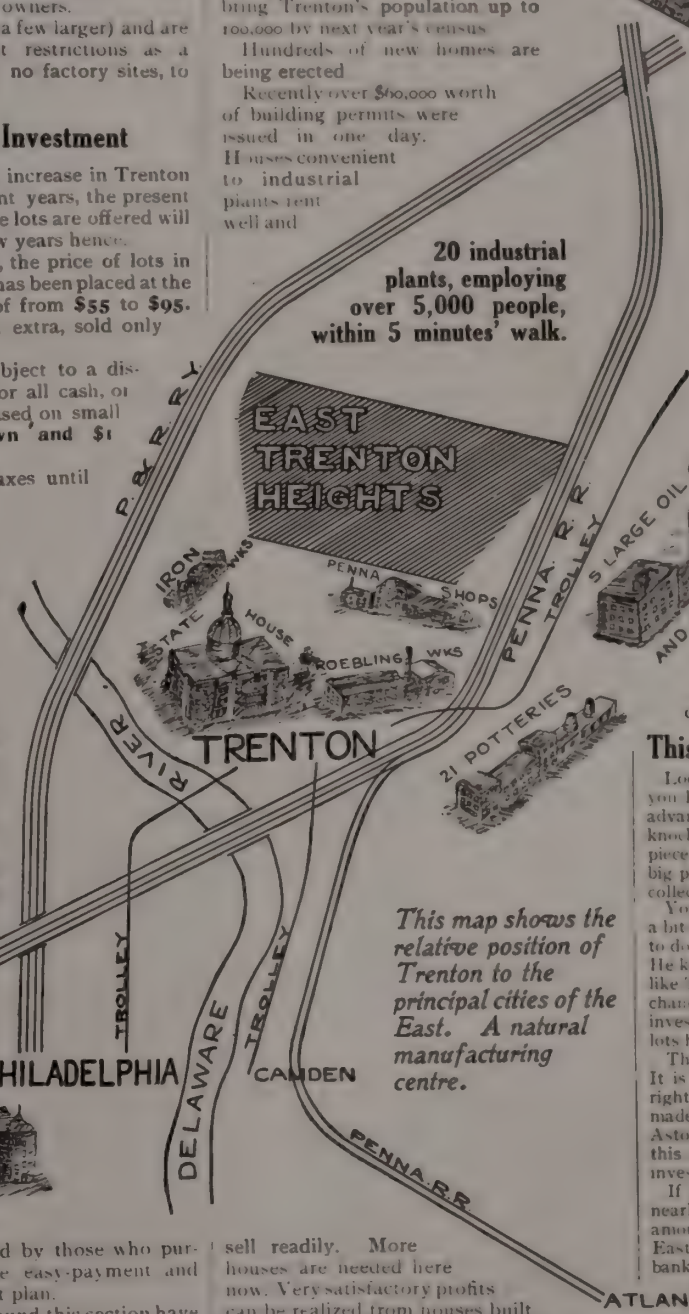
Building lots in an industrial city offer a safe and profitable investment because the growth of its industries and the new ones constantly coming bring their own population. Instead of increasing by a family or two at a time, hundreds of new families are added each year.

Trenton's population has been increasing 30 per cent in the past 10 years, and is now nearly 85,000.

It is officially predicted that the rapid expansion of the extensive industries already in Trenton, and the large number being added, will bring Trenton's population up to 100,000 by next year's census.

Hundreds of new homes are being erected.

Recently over $60,000 worth of building permits were issued in one day. Houses convenient to industrial plants rent well and sell readily. More houses are needed here now. Very satisfactory profits can be realized from houses built at East Trenton Heights now, and every house erected means so much increase to unimproved lots.



This map shows the relative position of Trenton to the principal cities of the East. A natural manufacturing centre.

Over 300 Per Cent Profit in 5 Years

Aside from the fortunes that have been made in Trenton's varied manufacturing industries, real estate investments show handsome profit.

A $4,500 investment at Front and Broad Streets has grown to $100,000.00.

A little over 5 years ago an East State Street property was sold at $20,000—the present owner refused $75,000.00 for it.

Another East State Street property bought about the same time at $40,000 has recently been sold at $[illegible].

$11,000 was paid for the site of one of the prominent department stores that is now worth $[illegible].

A North Broad Street property has increased within a few years from $12,000 to $[illegible].

All of these properties are within 15 minutes of East Trenton Heights. Acreage for miles beyond Trenton's city limits has increased to five and eight times the price of a few years ago; in fact the company developing East Trenton Heights refused an offer of four times the price paid for the entire tract, because the rapid development now under way and the erection of homes will show splendid profit to all lot owners.

Well Thought of at Home

The desirability of East Trenton Heights for a residence section of the city is strongly shown in the fact that the largest number of lots have already been taken by Trenton people. A prominent Trenton real estate man says:

"Every dollar invested in East Trenton Heights to-day, at present prices, will be worth $5 within a year. The lots are worth from $150 to $300 now."

First prices have been made so low to attract a great many people to Trenton who will build and reside here to assure the manufacturers of good help the year round. Those who do not wish to build now can of course buy for investment.

This is Your One Great Opportunity

Look around among your acquaintances. Do you know some man who a few years ago took advantage of the same kind of opportunity that knocks at your door now? He bought up a good piece of real estate that he has either sold at a big profit since or has built on it, and now simply collects his rents.

You say he was lucky and fell into a snap. Not a bit of it! He had the judgment and foresight to do the very thing then you ought to do now. He knew that buying lots in a live, growing city like Trenton spelt "fortune" sooner or later. The chances are he will be one of the first men to invest in East Trenton Heights and buy all the lots he can carry.

There is no patent on making money this way. It is just using your own common sense in the right way—the kind of common sense that has made the greatest fortunes in America. The Astor, Gould and Vanderbilt millions were made this way. Here is an opportunity to save and invest such as you may never have again.

If you put $200 in a savings bank, it takes nearly twenty years for it to double. The same amount, saved a little at a time and invested at East Trenton Heights, will be just as safe as a bank and a great many times more profitable.

Those who cannot now visit Trenton to make a personal selection should write to The Victor J. Humbrecht Co., Room 3, 137-139 East State St., Trenton, N. J. for descriptive, illustrated booklet and plan of lots; or, better still, to secure choicest locations reserved for those ordering by mail, at first prices, enclose $1, with name and address, to reserve the desired number of lots pending investigation.

If not entirely satisfied, your dollar will be promptly and cheerfully refunded. This puts out-of-town buyers on the same footing with those on the ground, and sometimes left to the company is made "satisfactory to the purchaser, or no sale." From present indications, this looks like a "soon over" opportunity, so that CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who want to share in it should act at once.

Questions and Answers

Reader, Delight, Wash. What was the name of the Pharaoh who advanced Joseph? What were the names of the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites and the Pharaoh who would not let them go?

The Pharaoh who advanced Joseph and welcomed Jacob and his sons to Egypt must have been one of the "Shepherd Kings," or Hyksos, the name given to the rulers of Arabian or Phœnician origin who overcame the legitimate Pharaohs and seized the government. After holding possession for five hundred and eleven years, they were driven out and the Theban dynasty resumed control. Joseph's Pharaoh was probably Apophis or Apepi II., one of the later Pharaohs of the Hyksos dynasty. The Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites was Rameses II., who reigned sixty-seven years. He appears to have married his own daughter Neferari, the lady who adopted Moses. The Pharaoh to whom Moses was sent, and who would not let the people go until the first-born of the Egyptians were slain, was Merenptah, the son of Rameses II.

C. W. C., Smithsburg, Md. What is the meaning of ship's bells?

The strokes of the ship's bell proclaim the hours. Eight bells, the highest number, are rung at noon, and every fourth hour afterwards, i.e., at 4, 8 and 12 o'clock, etc. The intermediary periods are indicated thus: 12.30, 1 bell; 1 o'clock, 2 bells; 1.30, 3 bells, etc., until 8 bells announce 4 o'clock, when the series recommences; 4.30, 1 bell, 5 o'clock, 2 bells, etc. The even number of strokes thus always announce hours; the odd numbers, half hours.

F. P. B., Star, Texas. When, where and by whom was the Salvation Army founded? Where are its headquarters now? Could you give a rough estimate of the number of souls saved through its influence?

The Salvation Army was organized in London in 1865, by William Booth and his wife, who started out from the Methodist New Connection to reclaim the neglected and degraded. In 1878 it was reorganized on its military model, with Mr. Booth designated as general. The English headquarters are in London, the American are in West Fourteenth Street, New York City. We cannot estimate the number of lives influenced by the Army, but there are nearly 15,000 officers alone, with at least 4,500 societies, operating in thirty-eight countries and colonies in thirty-four languages.

N. G. F., Bern, Ind. What time of the year is the most suitable to visit the following countries: Palestine, Egypt, India (British East India, Central Province), South Africa, South Sea Islands and Australia, China, the Philippines and Japan?

Our late winter or early spring is the best time for such a tour. Write to Cook & Sons, tourist agents, New York, for all information.

Milton R., Topeka, Ind. Where will I find in the Bible a reference to the evil spirit being cast out of heaven?

See Luke 10: 18; Rev. 9: 1; 12: 7, 8, 9.

George B., Owatonna, Minn., writes:

Referring to the question of M. R., Dennison, Minn., I beg to state that we find in Chap. V I. of the Talmud, these words: "About this time, when Moses was three years old, when Pharaoh, sitting at his banquet table with his queen upon his right, Bathia (his daughter) at his left, and his two sons, with Bilam (a magician) and the princes of his realm about him, took Moses upon his lap. The child stretched forth his hand and taking the royal crown from Pharaoh's head, placed it upon his own." This is the first time the Talmud mentions Moses being in Pharaoh's palace.

B. T., Boston, Mass. When were pavements first used?

The Carthaginians are said to have been the first who paved their towns. The Romans in the time of Augustus had them in many of their streets. The Appian Way was constructed in 312 B.C. Roads of heavy flags of freestone, of unknown age, exist in Peru, 1,500 to 2,000 miles long.

Inquirer, Cincinnati, O. What is the largest dictionary in the world?

It is probably the Oxford Dictionary, which is not yet finished. Concerning it, The Periodical says: "To date it contains 225,433 words; the main words numbering 156,579, the special combinations explained under main words 29,078, and the subordinate words 39,812. The number of illustrative quotations now exceeds a million—1,053,954." The Century is the largest now on the market in complete form, we believe.

V. W. K., Wollaston, Mass. When was "the year without a summer"?

The "year without a summer" referred to occurred ninety-one years ago, in 1816. Frost was seen in New England during every month of that year. Ice formed half an inch thick in May; snow fell to the depth of ten inches in Vermont, seven in Maine, three in the interior of New York, and also in Massachusetts, in June; ice as thick as window glass formed on the 5th of July in New England, New York and parts of Pennsylvania.

M. S., Huntington, Mass. What is the meaning of the name Sahara?

It is a modification of the Arabic sara or zaharah, meaning a desert.

R. J. C., Narberth, Pa. A woman anxious to keep in touch with up-to-date study along missionary lines, begs an explanation of the MAIL-BAG concerning the Northfield Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies.

As an outgrowth of the Central Committee on the United Study of Missions, appointed by the Ecumenical Conference held in 1900, an interdenominational mission study course was taken up by Women's Missionary Societies throughout the United States and Canada. The text-books prepared have covered the study of India, China, Africa, Japan and the islands of the sea, with many Helps to Study. This will be the fourth summer that Northfield has given a week to special study of the course and how to teach it, the study being frequently promoted by the presence of the author of the main text-book. This summer the season is to be held from July 23 to 30, inclusive.

R. J., Sandusky, O. Are not work and wages necessary concomitants of civilization?

It would appear so. In practically every land under the sun, the common people have been raised from ignorance and indigence by the introduction of industries, involving a regular system of employment. Where this is conducted by good, conscientious men, it means work and wages—not slavery. This method is still employed in savage countries, where the population is gradually brought into proper relations, with the result that education and civilization follow.

C. H., Deruyter, N. Y. Where was the island of Poros?

It is now Poro, one of the Cyclades. It is noted for its marbles.

Secretary Underhill of the Philadelphia School for Nurses, 2219 Chestnut Street, writes that Special provision has been made for taking a large number of young women in this School and giving them two years' free training in nursing. The object of those providing the funds for this purpose is to carry hospital benefits to all parts of the country. The scholarships are available for young women in every State. Preference, however, is given to young women from the smaller towns and rural districts, where there is an absence of hospital facilities.

Refuse Heaps in New York Streets During the Strike

NEW YORK has had a strike on its hands that seriously menaced the health of the city. The drivers of the wagons for the Health Department struck on account of the system of fines, and great heaps of refuse accumulated in the streets. In some places the piles were set on fire to remove the danger of an epidemic. If the weather had been extremely hot many deaths must have resulted. The air in some parts of the city had a heavy odor that was not at all appreciated, and caused visitors who were in the city for the first time to gasp with astonishment. There was considerable violence during the strike and several policemen were hurt, one being injured by a bomb thrown from the roof of a house.

H. S., Hadley, Mass. If it is true that the United States Government is about to send a fleet the Pacific, of what ships will it be compo and how will it compare with the Japan fleet?

The United States Government expe to send around Cape Horn, under the co mand of Rear-Admiral Evans, the follo ing ships:

Ships	Tonnage	Gu
Connecticut	16,000	2
Maine	12,500	2
Louisiana	16,000	2

Progress of the Hague Conference ✳ Queen Wilhelmina's Guests ✳ More Talk of War than Peace

If the kind wishes and bounteous hospitality of Queen Wilhelmina, the gracious hostess of the Peace Conference, could exert any influence over the delegates, the stern-browed representatives of the great military and naval powers might relax somewhat, and so give to the Conference a more promisingly pacific tone than that which has characterized it up to the present time. Thus far, the title "Peace" has certainly been a misnomer, for it has devoted itself more to devising plans for the regulation than for the prevention of war. It has taken up as subjects the use of mines, the rights of neutrals and non-belligerents, contraband, declarations of war before opening hostilities, and the like. One whole day's session of a special committee was devoted to discussing the forms to be observed between conflicting powers before either should strike a hostile blow.

Count de Beaufort
Vice-President

It is not necessary to join cause with those who are gloomily predicting the failure of the Conference. Indeed, it is useless to attempt to forecast results at present, for the reason that, in a single day, the whole form and character of the discussion may be changed. Some one of the Great Powers, spurred by economic necessity, may yet inject into the debate the one thing needed to give it life and purpose. Thus far, Germany, France, Britain and the United States have not been as prominent in the Conference work as might have been expected. Indeed, no one power can be said to have assumed the role of leader. The time and opportunity for leadership may come later. It is the desire of the intelligent and thoughtful people of all nations that the Hague Conference should not prove abortive. They have really very little interest in the Drago doctrine, the ethics of the initiative in war, or all the rules and regulations that may be solemnly codified for use in the international prize ring. Yet on looking around at the huge military establishments now existing on every side—at the armies of five European Powers, aggregating nearly 20,000,000, and the navy of a single Power costing $196,000,000 a year—there is little room for encouragement. Radical reform in the direction of peace is not expected; but there is a lively hope that the first real step may be taken by the present Conference toward the establishment of a permanent tribunal, whose advisory office might enable it at least to ward off war occasionally.

Curiously enough, the "small Powers," from which little was expected, have been very much in evidence. Korea, which has no separate standing in the Conference, being subject territory of Japan, tried in vain to submit a protest against the alleged violation of Korean sovereignty by Japan, but was not accorded a hearing. Argentina, too, has been endeavoring, vainly thus far, to get some expression from the Conference concerning arbitration. Turkey asked to be allowed to substitute the Crescent for the Red Cross in hospital work on the battlefield, and Persia, also repudiating the Christian emblem, wished to substitute the Red Sun and Lion for the Cross. Neither suggestion found favor with the delegates.

The Peace Conference in Session

Much interest attaches to Japan's probable course in the Conference. Her delegates have already submitted propositions dealing with the treatment of belligerent ships in neutral ports, under which no warship can stay over twenty-four hours in a neutral port of refuge, nor take on coal, ammunition or provisions, under pain of being disarmed and interned. Japan is evidently profiting by her naval experiences in the war with Russia. Still, wide-eyed and alert as her delegates are, expectation that she might prove a disquieting factor have not been verified.

Will the Conference develop a real peace leader, or will it confine itself wholly to the details of war? A few weeks more will tell the story.

A King's Service to a Criminal

TEXT: ACTS 13:36

"For David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers, and saw corruption."

DAVID "served his own generation." It was the only generation he could serve, as it was the only one with which he had direct and close relations. All other generations had been in preparation, and, as we shall show, he comes in vital touch with others than his own; but that "own generation"—all the people whom he met in the course of a long and eventful life, and over whom he had influence for good or evil—was the one with which he was directly connected.

The term "generation" is variously used. Sometimes we understand by it the average duration of human life: about thirty-three years, lengthened by the improved methods of surgery and hygiene in our day to nearly forty. But while this is the average, we must remember that the majority of the race die in childhood, and there are octogenarians and even centenarians in every period. Take a few of these centenarians in every century and three of them joining hands would bring us to the Pilgrim Fathers, four to Columbus, nine to the Dark Ages, nineteen to Christ and twenty-nine to David. So the ages are connected closer even by unbroken tradition than is generally assumed. The child holds the hands of the patriarch and is the link between the past and the future. Old people living but yesterday down South knew George Washington. Walter Scott conversed with and derived his information from eye-witnesses of some of the scenes he described. Lady Hester Stanhope used to tell how she remembered the "raw-boned young Irishman, Lord Palmerston, waiting to be introduced to Mr. Pitt." So youth serves age, and is in its turn served by age, and "Each one in his time plays many parts, his acts being seven ages."

David's Personal Service

David served his own generation in many capacities and ways. The Boy David watched his father's flocks on the plains of Bethlehem, and defended them from the attacks of the lion and the bear. The Stripling David became the champion of his country when the Philistine giant defied the armies of Israel. The Musician David soothed the madness of the Benjamite king by the sweet strains of his harp. The Fugitive David fled precipitately from the jealous wrath of that same king and was hunted as a partridge on the mountains. The Waiting David lingered for years among the Philistines, patiently watching the development of affairs, and biding the Lord's time for the fulfilment of his promises and the culmination by coronation of the anointing by Samuel.

The King David raised his country to its high place among the nations, and inaugurated by his wise measures the palmiest period of Israel's history. As the wise and just ruler he was in his political capacity the "man after God's own heart." But his preeminent claim to greatness was the transformation of the Royal Ruler into the more Royal Minstrel of the Church, and it is as the Psalmist David that he best served his generation and will be the longest remembered. By this means he has become the best known externally and internally of any of the heroes of antiquity, for in his undying song he has poured out his very soul, and revealed to us the depths of his nature, and made his winged words the great vehicle of the world's devotion.

Heirs of the Ages

In all these relations it is true that the generation served David while he was serving it, as our and preceding generations are serving us. We are to-day, as Tennyson says, the "heirs of all the ages." All preceding generations have been our servants, and their labors have placed us on the elevated platform of the twentieth century. For you and me the toilers of the past have triumphed, and we are inheriting the fruits of their labors. All the accumulations of knowledge in the past are ours to begin with. All the discoveries in the onward march of science have been made for us. For us the chemist has experimented and discovered the subtle relations and properties of mysterious matter. For us the intrepid voyager has braved danger in deep waters; danger in dismal deserts; starvation in marshy swamps and butchery from savage peoples. For us this earth has been mapped out into continent, isle and ocean, and its countries opened for our occupation. To purchase for us freedom of conscience and liberty of worship, confessors of faith have in the past suffered loss of wealth, friends and home; and some of them—to win for us liberty of thought—have shed their hearts' best blood. Heirs of the ages! All the toils, all the sufferings and self-denials of the past have been for us, and the achievements of the ages are ours to-day. In the period of the world's youth, men and women of the past have but prepared the way for the man and woman of the present and the future. Our lives are enriched because Moses legislated, because David sang, Isaiah prophesied, Jeremiah wept, Daniel dreamed and the olden prophets thundered forth the eternal verities of righteousness. We enjoy the light of truth because the Apostles founded Christianity, and because St. Paul took his long missionary journeys. For us the fathers wrought and the martyrs bled; and for us the Lord Jesus Christ lived, died, and rose again.

This Generation's Obligations

For us Shakespeare wrote his plays and Milton his poems. For us Friar Bacon solved scientific secrets and Lord Bacon discovered and applied his inductive philosophy. For us Columbus discovered America and George Washington fought the Revolutionary battles and left his country free. For us Martin Luther shook the world, and at the Diet of Worms, that greatest crisis of modern history, battled for the supremacy of conscience and made possible four centuries of liberty. As Jesus said, we "reap that whereon we bestowed no labor; other men labored, and we are entered into their labors."

And then for us the present generation, like the past, is toiling still. Sydney Smith once said that the "world had to be circumnavigated before the washerwoman could have her breakfast." That is literally true. The peoples of the whole earth are unconsciously serving you and me to-day. For us the miner delves beneath the surface of the earth, and on the surface the farmer clears the forest, hews the lumber, sows the seed and reaps the golden grain. For us the artisan toils at his handicraft and the blacksmith blows the ruddy forge. To feed, clothe and house us, and give us luxuries and comforts, the many sons of labor toil in their different departments. The mariner plows the deep. Ships sail over every sea and steam cars traverse the continents. For us the yellow Chinamen and swarthy Japanese work under Eastern suns, and the earth is engirdled with the band of commerce. For us the student burns his midnight lamp, and the inventor and chemist solve nature's secrets in their laboratories. For us the preacher, author, poet and philosopher rack their brains through many a weary vigil.

Centripetal or Centrifugal

Fifteen hundred millions of people, linked by bands invisible, are laboring to-day each for the other's benefit. And how about yourselves? They are serving you. Will you serve them? In one sense you cannot avoid doing so, for we are "every one, by divine enactment, members one of another." But for ourselves everything depends on the spirit with which we face this busy world. You may go out saying, "The world owes me a living and I will exact the payment by living a selfish life and making all these millions labor for my personal interest." This is the centripetal idea, the Greek idea of selfish self-culture: all to be made to work for the advantage of Number One. Or you may adopt the centrifugal programme, the larger Hebrew ideal of Christly self-sacrifice, and say, "This is my generation. I will serve and benefit it to the best of my ability by doing it every possible good in every possible way. I am here to make the world the better for my presence, and by the help and grace of God I will do it in the way he leads, leaving result and reward to him." The material results of both lives may be the same, but the prompting motives, in their influence on personal character, are wide asunder as the poles. David "served his generation by the will of God," and the Son of Man came "not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life as a ransom for many." "Though he was rich, yet for our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich."

Our fathers labored that we might "enter in," not into the results of their labor merely, but into the "labors" themselves to complete gloriously what they have so well begun.

> Where prophet's word and martyr's blood,
> And prayers of saints were sown;
> We to their labors entering in > Must reap where they have strewn.

Elijah goes to heaven in the fiery chariot and the mantle falls fluttering therefrom—not to be treasured as a sacred relic, but to be a potent instrument of present power: to smite the Jordan, divide the waters, and, in the hands of Elisha, continue its work of miracle, so that the onlookers can say not merely that the mantle, but "the spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha."

> 'Tis weary watching wave on wave,
> And yet the tide heaves onward;
> We build like corals, grave on grave,
> But pave a pathway sunward.
> We're beaten back in many a fray,
> Yet newer strength we borrow;
> And, where the vanguard rests to-day,
> The rear shall camp to-morrow.
>
> Though hearts brood o'er the past, our eyes
> With smiling futures glisten.
> For, lo! our day bursts up the skies,
> Lean out your souls and listen!
> The world is rolling heaven's way
> And ripening in her sorrow.
> Take heart! who bears the cross to-day
> Shall wear the crown to-morrow.

If you ask, How shall we serve our generation we answer, Serve it as David did, "by the will of God." Do it good in every way possible! Do good to men's bodies according to the ability that God giveth by feeding the hungry, soothing the sick, clothing the naked, visiting the prisoners, furthering all the philanthropic agencies at work for the world's betterment, bearing one another's burdens and copying the Good Samaritan rather than the selfish Dives. There are the old to be comforted, the suffering to be relieved, the ignorant to be taught, the poor to be dowered with treasure in heaven, and the hungry world to be fed with the divine bread of life. Do good! There's enough evil in the world. Do not let us increase it one iota, but overcome its evil with our good. Do good to bodies! Do good to souls! Better men's circumstances! and bear in mind the words of the Master, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these my brethren ye did it unto me."

David Serving Men Still

And then if you serve well your own generation you cannot help serving every succeeding generation also. David "served his own generation by the will of God and fell on sleep" and was buried in Jerusalem, his capital city. Nearly three thousand years have rolled their slow length along, and could he revisit the world to-day, it would be to him unrecognizable. He would see his own Jerusalem trodden by the Gentiles, ruled by the Mohammedan scimitar, and his own race repairing to their wailing place to mourn departed grandeur. He would inquire for his contemporaneous empires Assyria and Egypt, and discover that their glory had departed, and their names only enshrined in ancient history. He would find the German and the Slav, the Anglo-Saxon and the Frank, the Briton and the Japanese the predominant rulers of the age. He would voyage westward to a land of which he had never heard over an ocean which was a terror to his ancestors. He would find his sling and stone, his battle-axe and battering ram among the obsolete weapons and relics of by-gone age, his rude ships of Tarshish succeeded by modern merchantmen, the galley-slave war-boats by modern men of war, the asses and horses by railroads and electricity, post-horses and fleet-footed messengers by cables and wireless telegraphy. To him it would be almost a new earth. But in this far distant continent he would enter our churches and find the Bibles open at his own Psalms. He would hear his own compositions sung by the congregation in honor of the "greater than Solomon" who is here:

> Hail to the Lord's Anointed, > Great David's greater Son!
> Hail, in the time appointed,
> His reign on earth begun!
> He comes to break oppression,
> To set the captive free;
> To take away transgression
> And rule in equity.

He would hear in another language, but with the same sentiment, his own Psalm 103: "Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless his holy name. who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases; who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies." In the Sunday Schools and by sick beds he would hear his own Shepherd Psalm repeated in a hundred tongues: "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." And these new peoples in the new continents agree with

THROUGH DALMATIA THE BEAUTIFUL

A Land Where Time Moves With Leaden Feet

It is becoming quite the fashion now to make a tramp abroad each year. In these strenuous days change is creeping even into vacation time, and the traveler wishes to get away from beaten ...s, out of the world of trusts and strikes and monop...li; from summer girls, moonlight walks and pavil...n back to the simple life. We want to get to far...r vacation lands where few have been before.

...ere are few paths still unexplored in Europe for ...tourist, but here is one of them, Dalmatia. It ... Austrian crown-land that hugs the east coast of ...Adriatic. Centuries ago Dalmatia was part of the ...Illyrian Empire. Later it came under the sway of ...e, and after that of Venice. When the great ...etian galleys were built, the shipmen came to Dal...a for their masts. To-day, however, you would ...believe it as you gaze at the rocky hills.

... summer's sojourn in Dalmatia is one of pure de...t. James Gordon Bennett discovered this fact ...s ago; and there is an island, Lacroma, for which ...s reported to have offered princely sums, if only the ...town on the coast, that is its possessor, would sell it. ... best way to go from America is by way of New ...k to Genoa, with all the pleasures of the Mediter...ean cruise. Then over-land, eleven hours to Trieste, ... again by boat southward to the Levant.

...irst along that coast lies Istria—picturesque, but ... quite equal to Dalmatia. Then comes the famous ...hipelago, without a duplicate in the world. Islands ...ge enough to hold an Italian village; islands that ... mere rocks jutting over the edge of the sea, and with... even the seagulls' nests, because of daily washings ...the tide; that is Dalmatia. On some of these isles ...re remain soil and trees. In the shadows of the ...s lie the quaint fisher-boats with yellow-painted sails. Beginning with the days of the Romans and during ...netian supremacy, and notably in the days of the ...rks, all South Europe flocked hither for the tall ...es for their masts. As a result the land was denuded. ...en the bora, the biting winter wind of Dalmatia, came ...wn and aided the storms, and soon all the ground was washed off. And behind remained only the rock—snowy-white limestone, the whitest in the world.

Under the tender hand of distance this white turns first to pale blue, then to lavender, then to a deeper blue again. The sea is blue, the sky is blue, there is the white land against the background of blue. As your great steamer draws near, all the inhabitants come to the wharf to greet the passengers in the musical lingua Romana. The ship drops anchor in Ragusa.

One never saw such costumes anywhere else, even in the Levant. Each town has its own fashions for men, for women, for boys and girls, and these are as different from those of the nearest adjoining settlement as they are from our own. Nor have these gay costumes changed in centuries. The fashions were set, perhaps, when the Mohammedan left the country. Anywhere in Europe you can tell a Polan from a Ragusan, or a Cattaran from a Canaleser, as we could a Mexican from a man of New England.

It does one good to spend idle vacation days among such simple folk. They have their native foods and customs to which the traveler must conform, and which prove a novelty and a relief from those of Western Europe.

Few Americans, it is safe to assert, have ever seen the Albanian in his home environment. He stands six feet several inches tall, and is as straight as an arrow. His garments are of white woolen cloth; trousers, double-breasted vest, and loose-fitting coat. Around the waist he wears a cartridge belt, each cartridge several inches long and topped with gleaming brass. His gun, of the Saladin sort, is always in his hand, and at his side hangs a scimiter.

He offers his melons—watermelons. Away from the fashionable restaurants you crave nature's food, and you get it in the melon of the Nearer East. No larger than our cantaloupe, this fruit is plugged, filled with grape-juice fresh pressed, and the orifice then closed. The melon then lies in a brook to cool.

You want to take a peep at peasant life in the interior and you drive up into the mountains, to Canaleser.

Curious the reception they afford you here. The head of the clan, the patriarch, is away, and they send for him from the fields. Until he comes, your hostesses seem ill at ease. As soon as he comes in he draws from his belt a bunch of keys and unlocks the cupboard. Then he takes out a decanter two feet long and filled with clear colorless liquid. This is poured into a glass no larger than half a thumb, and when the glass is full, he drinks it down, wishing you welcome and joy in his home. After him the family repeat the performance, and then in turn you do. Such is the welcome in Canaleser.

Sight-seeing takes many forms. At Spalatro you may enjoy the realization of the fancy of the old-time song, when you dreamt that you slept in palace walls; for Spalatro is built within the imperial palace of the great Roman Emperor Diocletian. Where the imperial consort had her rooms, perhaps, is now your bed-chamber in the inn; and where Diocletian supped, on the same flag-stones, and shaded by the same loggias, may you dine also. Where the fan-bearers swayed their ostrich-plumes to keep the sun from the eyes of Cæsar, the modern awnings have been hung; and in place of golden goblets, clean white porcelain or glassware is set on the tables.

As you go south there are ever more wonders. The Balkans tower up; neither the Alleghanies nor the Rockies impress one as do these great mountains. The little defiles lead back to the home of the brigands, and were you not out for recreation and rest your nomad blood would tingle to explore these mysterious paths.

At Cattaro you reach Dalmatia's end, the bottom of the empire. Queer, comfortable wagonettes and diligences are here, waiting to take you by serpentines, built in the mountainside, to Montenegro and beyond.

...n in voicing their faith and his faith in his words—"Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the ...ys of my life; I will dwell in the house of the Lord ...rever." He "served his own generation," and three ...ousand years afterwards he is still serving the suc...eding generations as they rise and fall.

But David sinned—sinned a wicked and a cruel sin—double sin of adultery and murder. And he would ...d that that also is not forgotten, but recorded in the ...me Bible as his Psalms. He repented of that sin, bit...rly repented thereof, and his country and himself ...ffered a grievous chastisement in consequence, so that ...od forgave him and "restored to him the joy of his ...lvation." But he would find also that the world is ...t so magnanimous as God and has not forgiven him; ...r wherever his name is mentioned by a sceptic or ...orldling, it is always linked with Uriah's wife and ...riah's murder. But thank God, he would also find ...at the influence of that divine pardon is still at work. ... would gladden him to learn that in this distant age ...d land that sin, so bitterly mourned and deplored, has, ...en in our day, under God, been turned to account. ...e who "maketh the wrath of man to praise him" is ...le, as we have seen, to make the sin of man and its ...rdon to do his work. In far western Idaho, in the ...il, a man is confined who, by his own confes...on, is guilty of crimes that have made the world shud...r, and who professes to have been the agent of others ... wholesale assassination and murder. He says that he derived consolation and hope and finally trust in the God of David, and pardon and peace, through reading the old story of what happened in far-off Palestine in the long ago to that same King David who served his own generation by the will of God. He being dead yet speaketh, and while "the evil that men do lives after them," the good they get and the good they do is not always "interred with their bones."

Harry Orchard says that no man promised him immunity for his confession, but he felt it was the due of an outraged society for a great crime committed against the social order, and that the only way he could get right with God was to do as David did in the far-off time in his matchless penitential psalm (the fifty-first in our Bibles)—to "acknowledge his transgressions" and to say, "Against thee, thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight," and to feel again, in the words of David, "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise."

Whether Orchard is telling the truth is for judge and jury to decide; but none who read his words, and still less those that heard them as he described the motive that led him to confess, could doubt that that sad story of royal iniquity and of divine pardon had gone home to his heart. How immortal is truth! The sinner in that cell in Idaho hears the voice of the penitent king in Jerusalem bidding him seek the God who forgave him. David served his own generation. Yes, and he is still serving men near a hundred generations later.

"Footprints on the sands of time," writes Longfellow. Yes, more than footprints are written every day by those who write, not on sand, but on men's souls and hearts. In our museums you see on hardened slabs the footprints of the three-toed bird which trod this earth in its formative period before the days of Adam and Eve. And on similar Connecticut sandstone you see the fossilized raindrops which tell us of the rain that fell on that shore in the remote eons long ago.

Those same footprints of the bird on the mud, and the raindrops on the sand, have been preserved, says the scientist, for countless ages to enlighten us on the problems of primeval life before the times of mammals and of man. But he who writes his character in the book of God, by his labors and sorrows, and even by the sins which God pardoned, leaves to the end of time a lesson of God's unlimited mercy. So after serving his own generation by the will of God he writes something that shall survive the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds; something that will endure through eternal ages; something that will receive the smile of God and bring from the lips of the Saviour-Judge the priceless words, more precious than earthly tongues or angelic harps can render, "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!"

REAR-ADMIRAL SIGSBEE ADDRESSING THE CHILDREN

HOW MONT-LAWN KEPT THE FOURTH

WITH shining holiday faces and singing holiday hearts, everybody who was invited came to Mont-Lawn on the "Fourth." Every one of the 264 boys and girls from tenement land sang and shouted, looked and listened, in an abandonment of delight and wonder. From four o'clock in the morning, when the caretakers first peeped out of the windows to speculate as to propitious weather for prospective decorations with the tri-color, up to nearly eleven o'clock at night, when Dr. Klopsch drove down the winding hillside toward home, not one discordant note jarred upon the ideal perfection of the day.

As stage after stage clattered through the entrance lodge, and deposited its load of merry guests before the broad porch-steps, the inspiriting strains of patriotic airs rang out in greeting, rendered by a band of sixteen pieces. There's a story worth hearing about that band. Dr. Klopsch had been a bit perplexed about the provision of suitable music for the "Fourth," when a dignified-looking colored man walked into his office one day, saying, "Doctor, you did me a good turn once, and now I'd like to offer you the free services of my band for Mont-Lawn's holiday." So there they were, sixteen sturdy, crimson-coated pickaninnies, tooting and beating and clashing away with much spirit and charm.

The children's dinner was one of the features of the day. They made an interesting picture to the throng of onlooking visitors as they marched in orderly ranks to their seats before the bountifully spread tables in the capacious dining pavilion, every wide-open side of which framed a landscape painted with Mother Nature's own brilliant brush. A few holiday indulgences were added to the ordinarily simple but abundant fare, and the guests, who were later served with similar dishes, felt assured that even the inordinate hunger of active children must have been appeased.

Rear-Admiral Charles Dwight Sigsbee

Across the acres of emerald lawn swung the children in rhythmic quickstep, the waving folds of "Old Glory" casting mingled sunshine and shadow upon the hurrying little figures. Filling every seat in the beautiful Children's Temple, with guests lining the walls and crowding platform and vestibules, the little ones' voices were raised in tuneful praise to Him from whose gracious hand had come to each of them this wonderful interlude in their squalid lives. "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all," they declaimed; and the visitors' hearts were thrilled as the youthful representatives of many races declared their loyalty. Miss Grace Hildebrand, "the Gospel Nightingale," sang during the service a beautiful solo.

Mrs. Newman, the venerable widow of the widely-beloved bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, but recently returned from her mission in Jerusalem, was received by Dr. Klopsch with much distinction and led to a seat of honor. Dr. Vaughan, fresh from his work of a medical missionary in the Chinese field, told in simple, clean-cut diction, which commanded the attention of children and "grown-ups," of China's late famine, of its effect upon the children and of the tumultuous gratitude of the people when THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's relief was received. Tucked away in the doctor's story was an earnest word of thankfulness for his own early conversion and an admonition to his young hearers that they should heed the command, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth."

Adjourning en masse to the spacious sweep of the shaded lawns, a number of addresses from old friends were delivered, the band occasionally furnishing a ve popular interlude. The words of Dr. F. C. Iglehart were instinct with that deat less patriotism which has made America the nation that she is to-day. The Re W. P. George, D.D., and the Rev. C. W. McPherson followed with their customa humor. The Rev. J. G. Hallimond, superintendent of the Bowery Mission, always a welcome speaker, and he did not belie his reput tion on this occasion. Mr. George H. Sandison, associate edit of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, then introduced the distinguish speaker and guest of the day, Rear-Admiral Charles Dwig Sigsbee, who talked informally to the little ones in a peculiar happy vein, interlarding his address with numerous pertine anecdotes. He spoke of the progress of our country, th righteous causes of her wars and the happy and prosperous pre ent. Referring to the encouraging conditions which are givi us the opportunity to educate the children of an immigra population for the glorious destiny of American citizensh which awaits them, he closed by saying that it was always a inspiration to him, as he traveled over the country, to loo in the faces of the children, and to realize that they represente the potential strength of the future.

When the dusky musicians energetically struck up "Hail t the Chief!" everybody looked about for Dr. Klopsch. Th writer wishes it were possible for every reader of THE CHRISTIA HERALD to have heard its proprietor's earnest and emphati disclaimer of the tributes which had been paid to him as "phi anthropist and benefactor" by the speakers of the afternoon "Why," said he, "I am but the pipe-line through which th clear water flows; the pure, abundant stream of generou charity which flows in through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office from its subscribers and patrons all over the land to the needy and suffering o every race and clime." At the close of the exercises everybody, large and small was privileged to receive a cordial handshake from the gallant hero whose nam recalls the national injunction to "Remember the Maine."

The dusk of twilight was falling as the last guest rose from the substantia evening meal, and as the stars peeped out one by one above the tree-tops, th children trooped rapturously down upon the grassy slopes again for the ice cream without which no festivity is complete in childish estimation. In the glow o red light, and amid the explosion of an unusually attractive display of fireworks night approached unheeded, and only when nodding little heads and drooping baby eyes attested to the unwonted lateness of the hour did the last reluctant guest take his departure from the enchanting scene.

A touching incident took place after every tired little form had crept into its snowy nest, and the last evening prayer had been said under the gentle tutelage of the bright young caretakers. Dr. Klopsch led his famous naval guest quietly through the long dormitories, frequently pausing by a low white cot to gaze upon the innocent face of its peacefully sleeping occupant. Entering one of the pretty cottages where the older children were snugly cuddled in their cosy beds still exchanging excited comments upon the glories of the day, the visitors were treated to a softly sung lullaby of thanks to God for his unspeakable gifts, which served as a fitting close to one of the most successful days in the life of beautiful Mont-Lawn.

A Hint to American Girls

I young people but divined it, nothing renders them so charming as a beautiful deference to their elders. The girl who, as naturally as a flower to the sun, u to her father and mother, anticipating their wishes n yielding her own desires in ready consent to their s is simply irresistible. The stronger the nature the i and sweeter it becomes, if this grace of deference gi it its final and crowning charm.

The manners of our young c ntrywomen are less often than for- ly at fault in this regard.

"Her tone of j ronage and her supercilious air in d ressing her mother mark her as in- s ferably ill-bred."

Girls little know when they snub t ir mothers how disagreeable an im- p ession their conduct makes. The pert, p pant young woman in her teens or t r twenties, who fancies that she is s fficient in herself and scorns the advice of her mother, is a jarring social note. Happily she is rarer than of old, and, e en as Daisy Miller, is likely to be an o solete specimen soon.

Character is often indicated by ap- p rent trifles. The girl who brings a s awl to wrap around mother's shoul- d rs, who slips a cushion in the precise a gle to relieve a tired back, or remem- b rs a hassock for her mother's tired f et, will one day make a loving wife t the man whose heart shall safely t ust in her. She will do him good and n t evil all the days of his life. For t ue wearing qualities, warranted to last t rough all stress of weather, we recom- m end the girl who is the tender, t oughtful, and deferential daughter at h me.

I once knew a dear girl, in years lit- t e more than a child, whose study it was to make up all the deficiencies in her mother's c t. Her father was brusque and tempestuous, but P lly always bore the brunt of his tempers, and m naged to coax him into a sunny mood before her m ther had time to be wounded by his petulance. A b by came, and the mother was much worn by the i terruptions the little one made in her slumbers. M any a night the little crib was carried into Polly's r om, and the daughter cared for the baby that her m ther might rest. This mother was not very wise in s me respects; she had married young, and remained in s me ways rather immature till her hair was gray. P lly was of a sturdier fibre, and had New England g anite in her composition; but all her courage, vigor, a d resolution were tributary to her mother's aid and c mfort.

Even when parents and teachers are arbitrary and u reasonable, it is the duty of young people to bear w th them respectfully. In the long conflict with trouble, in the disappointments they have met, and the anxieties they have endured, parents may have become embittered or have grown pessimistic and discouraged. Youth is the true season of optimism. We shall never be sorry, we who are young, that we have been loving and patient with the parents who were in truth a little exacting at times.

The Two-Family House

Some years ago, Americans imported from abroad the idea of the great apartment house, in which numbers of families might be lodged under one roof, each family having a suite of rooms on one floor, with, if desired, a private hall setting it quite off from the others. In luxurious apartment houses, elevator service, facilities for telephoning, for posting letters without going beyond ones own door, for lighting and heating at minimum trouble to the householder, are taken for granted, and it is not uncommon to find a great deal of convenience in the simpler tenement homes where rooms are en suite without so much ornament and decoration as is common in the more expensive apartment homes. Still, there are very fine apartment houses that are badly lighted and poorly ventilated, and give an impression of gloom and stuffiness. The two-family house that lately is springing up everywhere in suburban neighborhoods for small families and those of limited income, is an improvement on the earlier plan. With a single front door and two bells, one finds two apartments, each of which is entirely separate from the other, the lower one being provided with a small vestibule, and the upper with a stairway. Each may have its own veranda, and the family residing in the one part may enjoy entire independence of its nearest neighbors. Builders are finding in the two-family house a very desirable investment for capital, and people newly married and about to go to housekeeping seek a two-family house for seclusion and economy.

The Forest's Harvest of Firewood

MATERIAL conditions, it is true, are driving the youth of small towns and farming communities into the constantly swelling stream which flows towards the stormy ocean of city life; but the true love of nature is not dying out. Many an over-driven business man, the hardships and deprivations of his early life softened by the mists of years, dwells wistfully upon the beauty and picturesqueness of the old-time farm life, of one phase of which our illustration speaks in eloquent, though voiceless language.

Shall Jack Have a Latch-key?

THE father and mother of a half-dozen stirring, clever and ambitious lads, no two of whom were exactly alike, were talking one day with a friend on the subject of bringing up boys. They had a right to speak as those having authority, for their youngest son had been lately graduated from college and had entered on a promising business career, while the others were already successfully started and were numbered among the rising men in their neighborhood. The mother of this family was for years an invalid, and the first consideration in the mind of the father had been to save her every small and great anxiety, and to make the path smooth for her feet. The father's rule had been that the mother was never to be left alone in the evening, and that, as he was a man of large interests, often compelled to be away from home for a week or a fortnight, two of the boys must always stay at home after nightfall to keep the mother company. I am not speaking of the time when they were all little chaps who went to bed at eight and whose playtime was by daylight, but of the period of adolescence when Harry and Jack begin to feel the pressure of dawning manhood, and when the coming years of maturity are beckoning them to the front.

The question, Shall Jack have a latch-key? was discussed by father and mother and a decision was made in the affirmative when their oldest son was sixteen. The provision was made that Jack should come home, unless prevented by circumstances beyond his control, by eleven o'clock at the latest; that he should close the door quietly and put out the light on his way upstairs, stopping an instant at his mother's door to bid her goodnight, if she were awake. The mother said, smilingly, speaking of this clause in the agreement, "I was always awake to say goodnight to my boy, and he seldom came home later than ten. Sometimes he slipped softly in, sat down on my bed and told me the story of his evening. Sometimes he merely kissed me and went to his own bed. As my other boys in turn had the latch-key given to them, I always knew the step of each as it rang on the pavement and came up to the front door. I always knew before he spoke which boy it was who was coming to wish mother goodnight."

In the training of our sons it should be remembered that they ought to be trusted and that they ought not to be subjected to spying, nagging and undue surveillance. Many a boy goes headlong to ruin because an over-zealous parent behaves as if this were the only thing to be expected. A father and mother who fill the air of the home with reproaches, reproofs and doubts need not be amazed if their boy brings disgrace on himself and grief to them. Establish relations of confidence between Jack and his father, let there be intimacy between Jack and his mother, and Jack may be safely entrusted with a latch-key.

Mont-Lawn's Festal Day

WHILE the "Fourth" is always a memorable day at Mont-Lawn, this year it was exceptionally so. Patriotism and high principle were the lessons inculcated by the speakers, all of whom were listened to with deep interest and appreciation.

Specially notable for many reasons was the address of Rear-Admiral Sigsbee, the leading orator of the occasion, by whose presence Mont-Lawn felt itself signally honored. Speaking to an audience composed of many different nationalities, he pictured the type of the true American, and showed how, largely by assimilating the best elements from other lands, our nation has attained to its present greatness. It was an address so happily conceived, so admirably suited to the time and the occasion, and so full of inspiration and encouragement, that it could not fail to impress even the youngest hearer. In the years to come, these children of the tenements, grown to manhood and womanhood, will recall with a thrill of pride and pleasure, the delightful afternoon they spent with the gallant hero of the Maine.

Nothing was lacking to make the entertainment perfect. Dr. George convulsed the little folks and the grown-ups with his merry stories; Dr. Vaughan told them of the children of China and their sufferings in the great famine; Dr. Iglehart let loose a whole flight of eagles, oratorically speaking, in honor of the day; Dr. McPherson made direct appeal to the child nature; Mr. Hallimond told how the great Republic grew and how the whole world still watches it with respect and admiration, and the Pickaninny Band filled in the chinks between the talks with soul-stirring strains and quaint Southern songs. And the big audience enjoyed it all, down to the very last dish of ice cream and the final corruscation of the fireworks.

Then, when the last of the stages had driven off with its merry load, and the children were snugly stowed away in their pretty white cots, darkness and quiet settled down on Mont-Lawn. The glorious Fourth was over. May its lessons live and grow, and bear golden fruit in the hearts and lives of the children!

The Chapter of Summer Accidents

NEVER a summer passes in which there is not a long list of accidents and casualties to cast a black shadow over the path of the sufferers and their friends. People are maimed in railway collisions, battered to pieces in motor cars, thrown by runaway horses or injured on trolleys, many of them never recovering from the effects of their injuries. Every summer, hundreds of young men lose their lives by drowning, and thenceforward their homes recall the hour of calamity with unspeakable regret. Summer is the especial time for outdoor pleasures and recreations, for athletic sports and manly competitions. It seems a pity that no human foresight has as yet been able to prevent as an opposite to the mirth and joy a weary tale of loss, illness and death.

The question is pertinent whether human foresight, were it duly exercised, would not reduce the number of accidents to the minimum. At least half the casualties reported in the press may be set down at the door of culpable heedlessness. We take unpardonable risks on the road. Carriage loads of people rush in front of express trains, with imminent danger of destruction, which they occasionally escape as though by a miracle. Individuals hastening homeward or to business, not having calculated their time aright, spring upon moving trains and are dashed to the ground, perhaps crippled for life, perhaps instantly killed. It may be objected that this peculiar carelessness is not confined to the summer. Still, there is an intoxication in the midsummer heat, and the general air of life and movement everywhere, that accounts for a larger number of accidents of this variety in summer than in winter.

To blame Divine Providence for wholly preventable disasters and to accuse our Heavenly Father of cruelty, when we are the victims of human recklessness, only add to the grossness of human ingratitude. God permits many things, for we are free agents and our wills are our own; but He does not for mere caprice injure a child for all its life, rob a family of its head, lay the bread-winner low beneath a moving train, nor send a lad in the flower of his youth to the bottom of the sea.

When accidents occur, accidents against which no safeguard could have been provided, when the household is darkened by a sudden blow, there may be a lesson for sufferers and survivors that they should not be slow to learn. Individual loss is sometimes profitable to a community, and personal ill works out to public advantage. Also, when suffering of any kind falls upon a life or a home, overshadows a town or a nation, it is to be accepted as having somehow, somewhere, a hidden good.

Reunion in Heaven

FROM one of our friends in an adjoining State comes an appeal that many a man and woman have uttered. In close and loving union he has lived for many years with a good woman, the love of his early youth and the wife of his maturity. It has been a tender and happy union, but now death has sundered it and he is alone. "She was a true Christian," he tells us and I am humbly treading the same path, not so faithfully as she, but with the firm conviction that when my time to die comes, I shall through Christ find an entrance into the heavenly mansions. Shall I see my wife there?

How often has that question been asked, when a grave, like a hard rock in a stream, has separated waters that have long run together! Will that stream reunite in the future life? How happy would it make the survivor to know that the beloved would be with him in that better land! It would so enhance the joys of heaven. Though we find no direct and explicit assurance in the Scriptures of reunion, we put the most hopeful construction on the hints we do find there.

Chief among them are Christ's own words. His reminder to the people of his own time that when God declared himself the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, he was the God of the living, not of the dead, was a distinct suggestion of heavenly recognition. Again, in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, Christ represented Abraham as not only knowing who Lazarus was, but as knowing what his life on earth had been. If we go back to the time of David we hear him saying of his dead child, "I shall go to him." He evidently expected to recognize the child, otherwise the prospect of meeting him would have been of small comfort. The apostle Paul, with his later knowledge, the man who had been caught up and had heard unspeakable words, declares his own confidence (1. Cor. 13:12): "Then shall I know even as I am known." That is what we need: to know and to be known. Let the consolation that comforted the great apostle be enough for every bereaved soul.

The Babies of China

ONE of the most remarkable photographs we have yet received since the beginning of the famine in China is reproduced in this issue. It shows a group of mothers, each holding a famine babe in her arms. There is a history associated with this photograph which is full of pathetic interest.

When the suffering was at its height and earnest efforts were being put forth to save the perishing population, the missionaries' hearts were wrung as they noted the neglected babies, who, being the weakest, were dying by thousands. "It is little short of heart-breaking to watch the tiny children and to hear their wailings that come from every house," wrote the workers. Relief measures helped the grown folks, but the tender little children, who could not subsist on tree barks and roots, gasped out their lives while the parents stood by and stoically pronounced it "the will of heaven." In one district alone, the Relief Committee declared "over 400 babies were left to die."

Urged by pity for these innocents, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on April 18, in cabling a remittance to the Committee, directed that $5,000 be applied exclusively to baby relief and urged the workers to make a special effort. They responded to the call with the happiest results. Thousands of little children in China to-day owe their lives to the generous friends in America, whose gifts enabled the Committee to supply condensed milk and other suitable food, immediately checking the infant mortality in many districts. Great numbers of the starving babes were taken to hospitals, where they have been nourished and nursed back to health. The group in the photograph, who are housed in Hsuchowfu hospital, have been literally snatched from the grave by this special fund, contributed by readers of this journal.

It is one of the joys of loving, self-sacrificing service done in His name, that we are often permitted to see how God blesses the work under our hands. Surely he has blessed it abundantly in the saving of the babies of China.

iamese Royalty in Europe

MONG the visitors to European courts this year is His Majesty Chulalongkorn, King of Siam. Though at home the near neighbor of France and England, a comparative stranger in Europe. His importance, ever, is fully recognized. On his arrival in Paris he greeted by representatives of the French President, conducted him in state to the palace, where he ived an official welcome. Thence he proceeded to land, where he had a most cordial reception. King ard sent royal officers to look after his comfort and onduct him to the royal palace at Windsor, where he ed as royal guest for three days. He was the lion of day at King Edward's great garden party. After ing the royal palace he returned to London to the nese embassy. There a deputation from Cambridge versity waited upon him and conferred upon him an orary degree. From London he proceeded to Copenhen, where the King of Denmark gave him a cordial come.

The King of Siam is fifty-four years of age and has n thirty-nine years on the throne. His country cov- an area of about 244,000 square miles, which is almost arge as the State of Texas. It lies between British rma on the one side and the French possess- s on the other and is therefore an important buffer te. It has suffered through the depredations of the nch, and in 1904 was forced to cede eight thousand uare miles of territory to its powerful neighbor. The ire population is little more than nine millions, of om about two millions are of Chinese nationality. The ntry is now being rapidly developed. The king is roughly alive to the value of Western civilization. was educated in Europe and is having his sons ined and educated there. It is believed that his sent visit is due to his desire to extend his railroad stem and to develop his postal and telegraphic facili- s. Even Bangkok, in spite of its fine buildings, is t poorly supplied with modern conveniences. The ligion is Buddhist, combined with spirit worship. Both e Baptists and the Congregationalists have established ssions in Siam, but the chief Christian work is now ing done by the Presbyterians. It may be hoped that e visit of the king to Europe will convince him that the velopment and prosperity of his country may be pro- oted in no better way than by the encour- gement of his people to seek the knowledge the true God.

Better is a little with the fear of the Lord than eat treasure and trouble therewith. (Prov. 15: 16.)

lectricity Causes Panic

A startling accident produced a panic on veral streets in upper New York recently. he New York Central Railroad has installed n electric plant for its heavy traffic and a emonstration was inadvertently given of hat it was capable of doing when it was ot under control. From One-hundred-and-wenty-fifth Street to One-hundred-and-wenty-seventh Street, along the viaduct, here was a brilliant display of flames and oud explosions. Streams of molten iron and opper poured down into the street as the eavy iron pipes, rails and wires melted under he fierce heat. Firemen were summoned, ut some one who professed to understand the tuation warned them not to turn the hose on he flames, lest the men who held it be elec- rocuted. People passing near stood still in error as the metallic rain descended and sput- ered on the pavement. The entire structure eemed to be on fire, though it contained no ood except the ties, which are embedded in tone ballast. As speedily as possible word as sent to the power-house and the current as turned off. Then the flames instantly isappeared. For a few minutes the red hot on glowed and gradually cooled. When the ructure was examined it was found that the ails, not entirely melted, were twisted into rotesque shapes and the big tubes carrying he wires were completely fused. It is said hat the whole trouble arose from a piece of ire being twisted around the third rail, hich made a short circuit when the shoe of motor car touched it. The fearful power f the mighty agent caused a sense of terror every spectator. The quiet invisible force hat can do more than even steam for the aid of man, becomes a destructive foe when it is wrongly applied. It is so with all the forces that God has placed at man's disposal. Even the Gospel, the source of spiritual life, is to be dreaded when it is despised and rejected.

To the one we are the savor of death unto death; and to the other the savor of life unto life. (II. Cor. 2: 16.)

Thief Scared by a Dummy

The house of a resident of Atlantic City, N. J., was entered by a burglar one night last week. He went about his work so noiselessly that none of the inmates was awakened. He made a collection of valuable silverware and bric-a-brac. These he stowed in a sack and then entered the sleeping chambers to search for jewelry and money. One of the first rooms he entered was unoccupied, but he saw something that scared him. The children of the household had been preparing for a masquerade that was to take place the next day. They had constructed of straw the dummy of a huge man and had dressed it and put a fierce mask for its face. In the dim light, the burglar had seen this man apparently glaring at him. He turned and leaped down the stairs and ran for his life, without waiting to pick up his bag of silverware. He left every door open behind him and in the morning it was seen, by his footprints on the lawn and in the garden, that he must have fled at his utmost speed. His guilty conscience made him afraid. As God warned the wicked long ago:

The sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them: and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword: and they shall fall when none pursueth. (Lev. 26: 36.)

A Banker Defrauded

Remarkable evidence was recently given by a millionaire banker of Marietta, O., at a trial of three men charged with running a faro game in New York. The banker stated that he had been approached by two men who told him of the game and assured him that the dealer had become disgusted with his pursuit and had determined to deceive his employers. The banker was urged to play, and was promised that the dealer would so work the game that by investing $25,000 the banker would gain $100,000. He testified that he accepted the offer and came to New York bringing $50,000 with him.

The Royal Barge of the King of Siam

He was taken to the place where the game was running, and the first night's play left him $25,000 out. He was told that the dealer had not recognized him and had therefore failed to carry out the plan. He played again and again lost $25,000. Another excuse was made and the banker was so determined to win that he chartered a special train to his home, and procured another $25,000 with which he returned to New York. That sum he also lost and then, concluding he was being swindled, he sued the three men. That men who run such a game deserve punishment is obvious, but it is not clear that the banker deserves sympathy. By his own account he was attempting to gain money through the treachery of an employee of the gamblers and they were too shrewd for him. He would have saved his money had he heeded the warning of the wise king:

Enter not into the path of the wicked and go not in the way of evil men: avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away. (Prov. 4: 14, 15.)

A Funeral of Scrolls

An unusual kind of funeral took place in Washington cemetery, Brooklyn, N. Y., on June 16. It was an interment of Jewish sacred scrolls that had been damaged by fire. The scrolls had belonged to Jewish synagogues which were situated in Irving Hall in New York. When the hall was burned some weeks before, the arks in which the scrolls were kept were destroyed. A careful watch was kept over the men who cleared away the ruins of the building. Fragments of the burned parchments were found and were reverently gathered up and carried to the new synagogue. There, in accordance with orthodox rites, they were placed in a coffin lined with zinc, covered with white satin. The coffin was covered with a black pall and placed before the altar. Rabbis read selections from the law and the prophets, and chanted psalms over the coffin. It was then carried at arm's length to an undertaker's wagon, which drove, followed by carriages containing rabbis and synagogue officers, to the cemetery. On its arrival it was reverently lowered into a grave prepared for it in the exact centre of a plot, and after singing by choir-boys it was covered over. The burned scrolls contained manuscript copies of the five books of Moses, and were very valuable, as they have to be specially prepared by skilled writers. The parchment on which they are written must be made of the skin of a clean animal; the margins of each page, the kind of ink and the pens used must all be according to laws of ancient date. When the scrolls become useless through damage by fire or flood, they must not be cast away or destroyed, but must be buried, as these were, with old-time ceremony. It is to reverence and care such as this, exercised by the Jews during past centuries, that we owe the preservation and purity of the Old Testament. Like those who bury their dead and concentrate their love on the grave, instead of looking up to where the spirit lives, these Jews honor the letter of their law, instead of delighting in the spirit, which in Christ lives for evermore.

But now we are delivered from the law, that being dead wherein we were held, that we should serve in newness of spirit and not in the oldness of the letter. (Rom. 7: 6.)

How China Welcomed the "Buford"

Viceroy Tuan and Taotai Yung Express the Nation's Gratitude to America

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

IT was 10 o'clock on the morning of Memorial Day (last Thursday) that the United States army transport Buford dropped her anchor on the edge of the Yangste, fairway about a quarter of a mile from the big "go-downs" (warehouses) and the great storage hulks that mark the river-side in the commercial town of Chinkiang. We were thirty-one days out from San Francisco, and, with stoppage for coal at Honolulu and Nagasaki, had covered more than two thousand leagues of ocean, our average rate of speed being something better than ten knots an hour.

First we were boarded by a brisk little gig bearing the customs officer—whose visit was purely formal, as all charges on the cargo of CHRISTIAN HERALD flour had been abated by governmental order—and then by Rev. T. F. McCrea, a missionary of the Southern Baptist Church, and M. J. Walker, agent of the English Bible Society, representatives of the Missionary Committee. With them was an aid of Yung, taotai or governor of Chinkiang and the surrounding contiguous districts.

These missionaries and their brethren in relief work have looked death between the eyes for seven months. They are well-nigh worn out. They have spent and been spent in their service of benevolence. They are heroes every one, and henceforward, to me and to all right-seeing and right-thinking people on the Buford, the title "Chinese Missionary in the Kiangpeh District" will be synonymous with self-sacrifice and the personal heroism that connotes the hardest kind of work with the smallest sort of reward in appreciation from those benefited or in monetary remuneration. Much as the Shanghai Civic Committee may have done in disbursing or collecting food and supplies, it is to these missionaries, who have gone down into the horrors of Kiangpeh, that highest honor should accrue, highest meed of praise be awarded.

Through their indefatigable labors, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Chinese Famine Relief Fund has been well and wisely administered. Not a breath of criticism rests or has rested upon the conduct of affairs by the Missionary Committee.

To Mr. Walker had been entrusted the direct discharge of the 80,000 sacks, each with forty-nine pounds of high-grade American flour, composing the cargo of the Buford. Acting U. S. Vice-Consul Frederick D. Cloud was detailed, in Consul-General Rodger's absence, to accompany us from Woosung and receipt to the transport for the flour, as consignee. From Mr. McCrea I learned, as already cabled you, that before our arrival it had been decided to distribute the 80,000 sacks as follows:

Relief camps at	Huaian	25,000	sacks
" "	" Tsingkiangpu	10,000	"
" "	" Antung	20,000	"
" "	" Yaowan	25,000	"

All the above mentioned camps are in the province of Kiang-Su, and I learned, somewhat to my surprise, that all the relief work made possible by foreign aid had practically been confined to this province by reason of the objections offered by governors of other affected provinces, who said they preferred to attend to their own relief measures.

The Fleet of Junks Taking Off the "Buford's" Cargo

However, the province of Kiang-Su has been afflicted most, and embraces the larger portion of the famine area known as Kiangpeh, which, as often explained, means "north of the river"; "the river" in Central China always referring to the mighty Yangtse.

In a few moments after the Buford's arrival the single-masted lateen-sailed junks began to surround the steamer and to take up positions along her white sides. To foreign ears it was confusion worse confounded. The boatmen yelled, sang, wrangled, laughed, and ran to and fro in utter abandonment. But somehow, out of confusion came a semblance of order, and by three in the afternoon gangs of coolies (pay ten cents a day), each under the supervision of a boss, the latter watched by a son of the mandarin in charge the port as harbor master, and all under the eyes of t missionaries—Walker, McCrea, Napier and Lampton had made a break in the cargo and were unloadi from four ports—two on each side of the ship. Befo the Buford sails for Manila some of the food furnish by CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will have found lod ment in the persons of famishing sufferers 200 miles the northward.

This flour, say the missionaries, will save hundreds thousands of lives. I go to the famine district up t Grand Canal in a steam launch, Messrs. McCrea a Walker accompanying me. The weather is very h and mosquitoes are abundant.

Since the middle of April, the deaths have bee many thousands. How many tho sand? That is a question no ma foreign or native, can answer eve approximately. "Will the deaths rea a million?" I asked Mr. McCrea. " cannot tell you," he replied, "nor ca any one. I cannot tell you the aggr gate in any one city or province, di trict or geographical division. Ther is neither census nor registry in China No record is kept of births or deaths We see thousands of families in mourn ing. We know of villages wherein one half the inhabitants have disappeare by reason of death or by removal t centres where relief is given or ex pected. We ask Chinese officials an they express absolute inability even t make a respectable guess concerning the aggregate of deaths.

Intense suffering in this famine ha been marked in only the first five o six days of utter destitution. After that came lethargy and subsidence of acute symptoms until death put an end to pain. Those, how- ever, who got a little to eat suffered long, and this is especially true of those who loaded their stomachs with indigestible compounds.

It is related that in making rock excavations for the great fortress of Kiang-Yin, ninety miles up the Yangtse from Woosung, a stratum of soft mud or clay, similar in many respects to fuller's earth, was found. Heartless officials dried a lot of this and sold it as a new kind of flour. They sold it very cheap, but many bought and ate, and all with deplorable—often fatal—results.

The missionaries have invented a name for the affliction following a diet of leaves, roots, bark and earth. They call it "green fever," and its immediate manifestations are horrible bloatings of face and extremities,

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

By Isabella Macfarlane

CHAPTER I

In the King's Cabinet

a small but sumptuously appointed room in the palace of Fontainebleau sat three persons, engaged in deep and earnest consultation—a woman and a Jesuit priest.

e royal personage was Louis XIV; woman, his unacknowledged wife, ame de Maintenon; and the priest, er La Chaise, his confessor.

vo large armchairs stood on either of the hearth, where a small fire of l was burning. Before each chair a table of exquisite workmanship in ing and marquetry. In the chairs the king and Madame de Maintenon, e the priest was seated on one of the cushioned stools in front of the 's table, intended, one for the prime ister, and the other for his bag conng state papers, when he came to sact business with his Majesty.

n the king's table lay a closely writt parchment, awaiting the royal signat . To this the priest, who was the cipal speaker, frequently pointed emphatic gestures; while the woman, ugh apparently engaged on a piece embroidery, gloated on it with intense ltation. For though those two perss hated each other—the one because was jealous of the woman's influence r the king, the other because the g's confessor had persistently opd the public acknowledgment of her rriage—they were at one on the subt under discussion, namely, the utter inction from the realm of France of Reformed or Huguenot religion—the P. R. (religion prétendue réformée), it was contemptuously called.

For, although Françoise de Maintenon s herself of Huguenot extraction, her terness against the reformed cause s (after the manner of converts) even re virulent than that of the Jesuits emselves.

"As your Majesty perceives," said the iest, continuing the conversation, in his ft, mellifluous voice and gentle man-r, "there is no other way to rid France this abominable heresy, this monster heresies, as it has been truly called, hich has spread over the whole people, om the highest to the lowest—no other ay, except to crush it, to root it out, to tirpate it. To this end, let the pastors e driven away, the rites of marriage and urial be refused, the children taken rom their parents and gathered into hools and convents; and let the dragonades, which have been so effectual in aining conversions in certain provinces, e established over the whole land. The nd justifies the means."

"It is my heart's desire," said Louis, to have but the one religion throughout y kingdom; and I believe that if the astors are driven away, the people will o doubt return to the bosom of mother hurch. Read to me the fourth clause nce more, father."

The priest took up the document, and read:

"Clause IV

"We enjoin on all ministers of the id R. P. R. who refuse to be converted nd embrace the Catholic, Apostolic and oman religion, to depart from our kingom and lands subject to us, fifteen days fter the publication of our present dict, forbidding them to remain beyond at time, or to hold, during the said fifen days, any preaching, exhortation, or ther function, on pain of the galleys."

"Good!" said the king. "Excellent! ow read me the tenth clause."

The priest read:

"Clause X

"We most expressly and iteratively forbid all our subjects of the said R. P. R. to depart, they, their wives or children, from our said kingdom, country, and lands subject to us, or to transport from thence their goods and effects, on pain of the galleys for the men, and the confiscation of bodies and goods for the women."

"That also is excellent. But what thinks Françoise of these extreme measures?" turning with a look of affectionate deference to the woman who dominated him (and France).

What Françoise thought of the measures is written in blood and suffering on the page of history; for the document under consideration was the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

"The priest took up the document and read——"

CHAPTER II

The Birthday Fête

A LARGE company had assembled at the house of David de Bonnefoy, a prosperous merchant of La Rochelle.

The occasion was the birthday, or rather the fête-day, of the merchant's mother, a venerable lady eighty-four years of age.

It was emphatically a family party, no less than four generations being represented, from the old lady herself to the little baby grandchild of her son. Uncles and aunts, sons and daughters-in-law, and cousins almost without number, filled the rooms, which had been tastefully decorated with flowers for the occasion. All contributed their shares to the general hilarity, each vying with the other in doing honor to the sweet old lady, who sat and smiled among them, the very embodiment of a beautiful old age.

The house was a large and commodious one, standing back a little from the street, and having in front of it a wide, grassy courtyard, inclosed on three sides with a low stone wall topped by a wrought-iron fence, of which material also the gate leading to the front door was formed.

In the kitchen, where Christine, the old family servant, presided, great store of good things had been provided; for David Bonnefoy was a man of liberal mind and abundant means.

"It is for my mother," said he; "and everything must be of the best, and nothing must be spared."

But though he was of course the originator of the festival, the prime mover in all the arrangements was his daughter Gabrielle, a beautiful girl of two and twenty. She it was who had despatched her younger sisters and brother to the woods and fields to gather the lovely flowers that grow wild in France, with which to make the garlands and bouquets that adorned the rooms—the purple foxglove; the fragrant wall-flower that springs from old walls, beautifying ruins with its rich, yellow-brown blossoms; daisies and pansies, and sweet violets, and wild roses, and honeysuckle from the hedgerows. She it was who brought the guests and presented them in turn to the grandmother, who sat in state in a handsome arm-chair like a queen on her throne, receiving from each one some small tribute of affection—a flower, a few bonbons, a little inexpensive trinket, or some such trifle.

Her mother being an invalid, Gabrielle had been obliged in many respects to take her place in the household, and the necessity had developed her faculties, and given her a force of character not often met with in one of her age.

After the dinner—which was elaborate, well served, highly relished, and enlivened by playful sallies of wit and words of good cheer—the next thing in order was a romp on the greensward; and for this the whole company repaired to the courtyard; for in the delightful climate of that region, where extreme heat and cold are unknown, the people almost live out of doors.

Half a dozen willing hands carried out the chair of the old lady, the couch of the invalid mother, and even the cradle of the married daughter's baby, that all might participate in the scene of enjoyment.

And here the great crowning act of the day was to take place; for the venerable dame herself, with the unquenchable vivacity of a Frenchwoman, was to open the fête, with one of her descendants as her partner.

Great was the strife and emulation among those descendants as to which should have the honor. Cousin Theodore thought he should have it because he was her eldest nephew. Cousin Dominique claimed it because he had come all the way from Paris to attend the fête. Cousin Clement thought he should have the privilege because (as he claimed) he loved her better than any of the rest—a claim which all the rest vociferously denied.

The matter was settled by the dear old lady herself choosing as her partner Raoul de Bonnefoy, her youngest grandson, a young fellow of nineteen or twenty, who had just become a member of the burghers' corps, and was there in all the glory of his new regimentals.

The old lady wore a simply made gown of white muslin, confined at the waist by a scarlet ribbon. On her head she wore a neat cap of linen cambric, bordered with rich lace, among the full gathers of which some loops of red ribbon, to match her girdle, were interlaced.

To see that sweet-faced woman promenading with the stalwart youth at her side, while opposite to them were Gabrielle and Louis Marquand, the pastor's son, was a sight that gave pleasure to all except one young girl named Rosalie Bertrand, who would fain have been in Grandma Bonnefoy's place.

But Rosalie's turn came when the young soldier soon led the old lady back to her chair, and seating her with tender care, planted a resounding kiss on the old cheek, soft and wrinkled like a withered apple, but now slightly flushed from the unwonted exercise.

Then the merry pastime was given up to the younger part of the company, while the elders sat around, or formed themselves into groups for conversation. And the conversation was not all of family affairs.

For, notwithstanding the harmless gaiety, light-heartedness and general jollity that marked the occasion, an undercurrent of gloom and apprehension pervaded all, and rose unbidden to their minds even in the midst of their pleasure.

"Well, David," said Cousin Dominique, addressing his host, "the bolt has fallen. The Edict—that Edict granted to us Huguenots by Henry of Navarre, guaranteeing to us our rights as citizens—has been revoked, and all our rights taken away."

"It is too true," said David; "yet I was hardly surprised to hear of the revocation; for as you know, the enactments of the Edict of Nantes have been with a hardening of the abdominal region and a distension thereof ghastly to look upon and usually fatal.

Without announcement, and only four hours after our arrival at Chinkiang, Taotai Yung, accompanied by his chief magistrate and harbor master, and a retinue of servants, came on board to make an official call upon the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Yung is a Manchu, and large and imposing, as I have found all northerners of rank to be. He wears a sparse mustache, has a dignified courtesy and a pleasant smile that are most fetching, and he was cordiality itself. Mr. Walker acted as interpreter, and the conversation ran about in this wise:

MYSELF: "Your Excellency, I come as representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and those who through that paper have been instrumental in sending $450,000 in gold, or its worth in supplies, to your stricken and starving people, and to tell you that American hearts are full of sympathy for you and your people in their distress. They are glad to give of their substance to relieve your needs. They are glad to show their feeling of brotherhood."

THE TAOTAI (rising and bowing three times, with hands clasped in an arch above his breast in Chinese salutation): "I am unworthy, unworthy! I am honored by what you say, and by your representative presence. From mind and heart I tell you thanks. I charge you convey to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD particularly, and to the Americans generally, my warmest gratitude, and that of all my people. We will never forget what you have done. We will remember while life lasts this great ship, its cargo of food, and what it means to the starving. I am unworthy! I am honored!"

All this was said in sincerest fashion, and with a dignity that added great impressiveness.

After writing his name on my visiting card, as an evidence of good will and friendship, the Taotai and his suite adjourned to the promenade deck, where they were photographed with Consul Cloud, Captain Hall, Mr. Walker and the writer. We served them tea, which they did not care for (and I don't blame them, after tasting some of theirs later), and American confections, which they enjoyed greatly. Arrangements were made for a return visit at 10 this morning, and I was informed that I would be expected as guest at a "feast" to be served at military headquarters at 6.30 this evening. I tried to beg off, but the Taotai said:

"You must come. How could I save my face if I did not show honor to a representative who has come so far to show good will and give us food?"

Chairs—silk-lined and canopied, with four bearers each and preceded by a shouting guard — were provided for the journey of two miles from the military headquarters near the river to the yamen of Yung, within the wall of the Chinese city proper. We were borne in all state through crooked streets, about as wide as the hall in an American apartment house, covered with wheelbarrows, burden-bearers, dogs, donkeys and people, lined with shops, stores, tea-houses and work-benches, through teeming thousands of a happy-seeming population, most of them busy doing things backward —or so it seemed to Western eyes — reversing our most ordinary processes as to direction, from sawing wood to shaving chins, from writing letters to washing woolens.

Constant were the cries of advance courier and bearers, and to their "Hoia! Sha! Sha!" (I spell phonetically) the people yielded in all good nature. One diminutive but recalcitrant donkey was carried bodily by his owners into a butcher shop, and proved the strongest protestant to our journey.

Arrived at the yamen our chairs were borne through lines of saluting soldiers and deposited at an inner door, where the Taotai, the Prefect, the commanders of Fort Chinkiang and the military forces of the district and their soldiers of rank received us with the "nods and becks and wreathed smiles" that are concomitants of Chinese courtesy.

We were conducted through a multiplicity of passages to a room opening into an inner and walled court and seated at a table on which were tea, cakes, Chinese chestnuts, cubes of preserved sugarcane, crackers, etc. The Taotai repeated his welcome, and then, after bowing deeply, added: "I have to-day received a telegram from his Excellency the Viceroy (Tuan-fang of Nanking), commending you to me, and telling of his deep gratitude for all your people have done for us. The Viceroy says he can never express his gratitude properly, but that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's generosity now and on former occasions has made deep and lasting impression on the hearts of himself and his people."

I replied briefly and then formalities were dropped. Yung spoke of Dr. Tenney of the university of Tientsin, whose friendship he grew to value while prefect of that city. He told me of the boy aged six and the girl aged one who had come to bless his old age (he is 58) and at my request sent for the boy—a bright, handsome urchin, who kow-towed to his waist but finally shook hands, allowed me to take him on my knee, accepted an American quarter (he had never seen a United States coin) and laughed with glee over my promise to send him a Teddy bear. His father was as foolishly fond as an American daddy could have been, and with some ceremony presented me a photograph of the boy, blessing it and me in earnest fashion.

"In all my years in China," said Mr. Walker, "I have never seen a high official so effusively cordial as Yung has been to you. Evidently he and his superiors are full of real gratitude and want you to know it. It is very rare for a Chinaman of rank to shake hands, whereas he fairly embraced you as representing the givers of food and money that have saved hundreds of thousands of his people from death by starvation or disease."

Unquestionably, famine will come again in the late autumn. It may be worse in 1908 than it has been in 1907.

The entire foreign colony of Chinkiang and the adjacent territory was saddened by news of the death of Dr. J. E. Williams, of the China Inland Mission. He died of heart failure, consequent upon typhus or "famine" fever, contracted in the relief hospital of Chinkiang, of which he had sole charge and where he spent hours in life-saving service every day. He was loved by all the thousands who knew him or to whom he had ministered and given his life, a martyr to his convictions of duty. He is the fifth of the missionaries to die, and his brethren are so grief-stricken that it is pitiful to see them. He was buried in the secluded foreign cemetery.

Dr. Williams was born fifty years ago in Lincolnshire, England; was educated in London, and came to China eighteen years ago, assigned to the interior, where he worked for sixteen years. He came to Chinkiang two years ago and has been instant and constant in service, not only to native but to foreign resident needs. He leaves a widow but no children.

Deserving of Success

The marvelous growth of Borden's Condensed Milk Company is due to unceasing vigilance in observing rigid sanitary regulations in the manufacture of their products. Eagle Brand Condensed Milk and Peerless Brand Evaporated Milk (unsweetened) have received highest awards wherever exhibited.

The hotter the day and the dustier the course, the more you appreciate a shower-bath, after the game is over.

It takes only a few minutes. And all you need is: A cake of Ivory Soap, a plentiful supply of hot and cold water and a coarse towel Cover yourself from head to heels with the Ivory Soap lather. Then, turn the taps and let the water descend on you in refreshing showers.

There! Look at yourself! You are a new man! Your eyes sparkle. Every nerve in your body tingles and your skin is as smooth as satin.

Ivory Soap is in use in the bath and toilet rooms of the majority of golf clubs.

It ought to be in all of them. It would be if golfers who appreciate the importance of pure soap would insist on it.

Ivory Soap . . . . . It Floats.

A SMALL SECRET

Couldn't Understand the Taste of his Customers

Two men were discussing the various food products now being supplied in such variety and abundance.

One, a grocer said, "I frequently try a package or so of any certain article before offering it to my trade, and in that way sometimes form a different idea than my customers have.

For instance, I thought I would try some Postum Food Coffee, to see what reason there was such a call for it. At breakfast I didn't like it and supper proved the same, so I naturally concluded that my taste was different from that of the customers who bought it right along.

A day or two after, I waited on a lady who was buying a 25c package and told her I couldn't understand how one could fancy the taste of Postum.

'I know just what is the matter' she said, 'you put the coffee boiler on the stove for just fifteen minutes, and ten minutes of that time it simmered, and perhaps five minutes it boiled, now if you will have it left to boil fully fifteen minutes after it commences to boil, you will find a delicious Java-like beverage, rich in food value of gluten and phosphates, so choice that you will never abandon it, particularly when you see the great gain in health. Well, I took another trial and sure enough I joined the Postum army for good, and life seems worth living since I have gotten rid of my old time stomach and kidney troubles."

Postum is no sort of medicine, but pure liquid food, and this, together with a relief from coffee worked the change. "There's a Reason."

aside and trampled on these many
s. Have we not seen, in our neighprovince of Poitou, the atrocities mitted by the intendant Marillac r years ago? Nay, have we not seen, our own Rochelle, our temples de-yed, our pastors driven into exile, our ools and colleges closed, children torn n their mother's arms, and thousands so-called heretics compelled to recant, pain of death or the galleys? Is not own beloved pastor, Louis Marnd's father, at this moment hiding in woods and marshes, watching for a nce to escape to England or Holland, ing been ordered to leave the country twenty-four hours' notice?"

It is fifteen days' notice now, for the le realm of France, not for a single vince."

But the worst of all," said Cousin odore, "is that the dragonnades, ch caused such havoc in Béarn and tou, are to be established every-ere, and our homes profaned by a de of brutal soldiery, fresh from the ssacres and rapine of the campaigns the Netherlands."

'No doubt the king's dragoons are ital," said Cousin Dominique, who was arge, portly man of middle age, very f-satisfied and opinionated; "but I hold t the men who yield to them and sign ay their conscience from the fear of m are cowards—arrant cowards."

'Ah, Cousin Dominique, be not too hard them. Human nature is weak, and you have not lived in Poitou, you have idea of the tortures practised on se poor creatures—beatings, maimings, rvation and compulsory sleeplessness, til there is nothing left for them but yield or die."

"Then let them die," said Cousin minique, with decision.

"The dragonnade has not yet reached Rochelle; but we do not know how on its horrors may be upon us."

"By that time I shall be back in aris," said Dominique, whose thoughts ually centred in himself. "Paris is e safest city in the kingdom, for it is empt from the dragonnades."

"Many people succeed in escaping to her lands, though all except the pastors e forbidden to leave the country," said avid. "During the Marillac persecun, a relative of ours, Roger de Bonney, escaped to the West Indies by way England, and from thence reached a ty of North America called New ork, known until a few years ago as ew Amsterdam. That is where I should ke to go, if my dear native land of rance refuses any longer to shelter me."

"Speaking of Louis Marquand," rearked Cousin Theodore, "what a pretty uple he and my sweet cousin Gabrielle ake. Have they a liking for each ther?"

"It is more than that," replied David;
they are already affianced, and there is o young man whom I would sooner call y son-in-law than he. He has studied ith his father, and in fact was apointed by the synod as his assistant.
ut that is at an end now."

Here a great noise and hubbub was eard outside. On looking forth, the uests beheld a troop of horsemen canering down the street, their horses' feet lattering, their spurs jingling, their ccoutrements glittering in the rays of he declining sun, and their scarlet loaks floating out on the evening breeze hat blew landward from the Bay of Biscay.

"Heaven preserve us!" ejaculated Cousin Dominique. "The dragoons are pon us!"

CHAPTER III

The King's Dragoons

THE music stopped short. The women uttered cries of terror, and ran into corners to hide themselves, as the troop drew up at the gate.

The leader, a fine-looking young man of slender but athletic frame, dismounting, advanced. He held a paper in his hand.

David de Bonnefoy stepped forward, opened the gate, and demanded his business.

"Is your name David de Bonnefoy?"

"That is my name."

"Are you a Huguenot?"

"I am of the reformed religion."

"Then I have to inform you," glancing at the paper in his hand, "that twenty soldiers of the king's dragoons have been billeted on you, to be housed and fed by you until such time as his Majesty thinks fit to remove them."

"Twenty men? That is too many for one household. I have a large family, a sick wife, an aged mother; and these guests—some of them have come from a distance and will have to stay all night. It is not possible—"

"I have nothing to do with that. All that concerns me is to see that the king's commands are carried out. Have you a stable?"

"I have not."

"No matter. Yonder stands one of your 'temples,' as you call them. It is no longer of use for preaching. It will make an excellent stable for our horses."

"That is desecration."

"Not at all. A horse is as good as a heretic, if not better. Dismount, my men, while I get the key of the temple, and put up your horses. Monsieur Bonnefoy will see that they get plenty of good fodder, and will also provide a supper for yourself."

"Do you remain with your troop, Captain?"

"No, I mess in the citadel with the other officers; but," with a look at Gabrielle as she stood by her mother's couch that made her father shudder, "I shall look in occasionally to see how you are treating my boys."

With another sidelong glance of his bold black eyes in the direction of Gabrielle, the officer turned away, and remounting his horse, rode away with his troop toward the half-demolished temple.

Scarcely were they gone when Cousin Dominique hastily began to make preparations for departure, putting on his riding-coat and muffler, and buckling on his spurs.

"What! Dominique," said his host, "surely you are not going to set out for Paris at this late hour of the day?"

"Yes, I am going to set out in just ten minutes from now, if you will send a boy for my horse, which is stabled in the next street. As I said, Paris is a safer place than La Rochelle, and the cover of night is better than the glare of day."

"Who is the coward now?" said David, laughing in spite of his trouble at the undisguised trepidation of his relative; but Cousin Dominique was busy with the fastening of his riding-coat, and made no answer.

"Since you are determined to go," continued the other, "I almost wish you would take Gabrielle with you. I cannot bear to think of her under the same roof as those ruffianly soldiers."

"No, no, cousin," said the big man, who was a wealthy bachelor. "Do not think of such a thing. I could not take the responsibility. The larger the company the greater the danger. I shall have all I can do to take care of myself."

And selfish Cousin Dominique mounted his horse and rode away, leaving the rest to take care of themselves.

Soon the troopers reappeared, shouting, swearing, singing ribald songs, and making themselves as obnoxious to their entertainers as possible.

They took possession of the best rooms in the house, seized on everything eatable or drinkable that they could find, broke up the handsome furniture for firewood, and kept up such hideous noises through the night that none of the family (who were gathered in an upper room, guarded by David and his son Raoul) could obtain any sleep.

SAPOLIO

The Oldest Woman Living

TO Oregon belongs the distinction of including among her population an old lady who celebrated her 120th birthday on May 20, 1907. Mary Ramsey Woods, of Hillsboro, in that State, was born in 1787, when the American constitution was yet unwritten. She was a lisping child when Washington was President. Marrying Mr. Jacob Lemons at the age of seventeen, she was a wife and mother when Fulton's first steamboat puffed up and down the Hudson, and had reached the maturity of forty years when the first American railway was laid. The daughter of her youth died at the ripe age of ninety-eight; the sole survivor of her four children, Mrs. C. B. Reynolds, at the age of seventy-seven years, is her still active mother's nurse, housekeeper and companion. Widowed seventy-five years ago, Mrs. Woods again married and again became a widow. This remarkable woman, who has attained to the phenomenal age of six score years, distinctly remembers such incidents in the history of our country as the ceding of Louisiana to the United States by the French; the period when Lewis and Clark penetrated to Oregon, and the day when her father took down his gun to go out to fight in the War of 1812. She spent the recent anniversary of her natal day in receiving the warm congratulations of a host of friends.

How many houses have you presented to your landlord

The rent-payer actually pays for a house every ten or twelve years.

The landlord gets the money—and keeps the house, too.

This Company makes it possible for you to be your own landlord, and the rent you pay buys your home.

Our plan is absolutely original and sound. It has been approved by skilled actuaries and by State and Federal authorities.

It is the most equitable plan ever devised for helping a man to buy or build a home.

You select your own location—choose your own house. We furnish the money at less cost than if you borrowed from a bank.

QUIT WHITE BREAD

Could Not Get Strength From It

A Yorkstate minister, who is interested not only in the spiritual welfare of his congregation, but in their physical well being, says:

"I can now do an immense amount of work and feel no fatigue, for the reason that I am using Grape-Nuts food and have quit coffee entirely and am using Postum Food Coffee in its place.

"Myself and family are all greatly improved in health. We have largely abandoned the use of white bread. Upwards of twenty-five persons have changed their diet, on my recommendation. It is gladly given, because I know, from personal experience, whereof I speak."

It is a well-known fact that white bread is almost entirely composed of starch and this is difficult of digestion by many people, particularly those who have weak intestinal digestion. The result of the use of much white bread is a lack of brain and nervous power to do mental work, and it also creates intestinal troubles, because the excess of starch ferments in the intestines and makes the condition right for the growth of microbes; whereas Grape-Nuts food contains the needed starch, but in a pre digested form. That is, it is transformed into grape-sugar in the process of manufacture, and delivered in the packages, ready cooked, and in such shape that it is immediately assimilated without hard work of the digestive organs.

The food also contains the delicate particles of phosphate of potash which, combined with albumen, is used by nature to make the gray matter in the cells of the brain and the nerve centres throughout the body, in order to give strength and ability to stand long and continuous work. Destroying the Popular Idols

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE Israelites had grown accustomed to the daily sight and leadership of Moses, and when he had not been seen by them for nearly seven weeks, because he was on Mount Sinai with God, and when they seemed to have lost their hold on God because he did not appear in their fiery cloud and pillar to talk with Moses, then their hearts failed them. They required that they should see the God whom they were serving, and so they came to Aaron urging him to make an image. Since they had never seen God, they could not suggest an image made in his likeness. But they had long been accustomed to seeing the worship of a calf in Egypt, and they knew that the Egyptians supposed that it represented deity; so they resolved that they would worship a calf. And when they had thus resolved they gladly brought their rings and bracelets of gold to Aaron with the request that he should make for them a golden calf. If Aaron had been as strong a character as Moses, he would have quickly rebuked the people for such an error and refused to yield to their foolish and wicked request. But Aaron yielded and made the calf, and set it up for the people to worship. Men may be deceived, but God is not mocked. He saw that his people were worshiping an idol, in violation of the Second Commandment, which he had just given them. Moses did not know what Israel was doing until he came down from Mount Sinai with the tables of the Law. These he dashed to the ground and broke as a symbol perhaps of what the people were doing.

"Moses' anger waxed hot and he cast the Tables out of his hands"

Punishment for Idolatry

When Moses came into the camp, he ordered the calf to be taken down and ground into powder, and this was to be given to the people in water to drink. Think of drinking up a god! This wicked idolatry was further punished. Aaron was reproved by Moses for his part. The excuse he had to offer was a weak one indeed for a leader: "Thou knowest the people, that they are set on evil." He actually ascribed to a supernatural power the moulding of the calf, for he said, "When I cast the gold into the fire it came out a calf." Moses proclaimed that all who were on the Lord's side, and had nothing to do with the making and the worshiping of the calf, should gather around him. And the tribe of Levi responded, numbering many thousand men, and Moses gave them command to slay with their swords those who had worshiped the calf.

When the people humbled themselves before God, and stripped themselves of all their ornaments, God, as always, accepted their repentance and restored them to his favor.

This lesson suggests: 1. The persistency of superstition. 2. The worship of gold. 3. Individual responsibility to resist evil however popular. 4. The crumbling of idols.

Israel Corrupted in Egypt

1. The persistency of superstition. It is strange enough that the Israelites, who had so recently seen the utter defeat of Egypt's animal gods by their invisible God, and had just received in thunder tones from Sinai his command to make no graven image for worship, reverted to the idolatries which many of them had doubtless fallen into while degraded slaves in Egypt by worshiping the golden calf. But it is far more strange that, in countries so long civilized as Japan and China and India, we should see together telephones and heathen temples, dynamos and manufactured deities. In Egyptian railway trains one may see Mohammedans throw their prayer rugs in the aisle, and, facing toward Mecca, offer prayers that are

Mammon-Worship

. The worship of gold. The Israels gave gold to make a god, but many derns less generously keep gold and ke it their god. This is the special nptation of two nations, otherwise ong the best—Great Britain and the ited States, whose chief peril is devon to creature comfort as a substitute r devotion to God and our fellows.
hatever holds the controlling place in r lives is really our God, and thou-nds seem to worship only gain by y and Pleasure by night. The Dives t Jesus Christ pictures in hell is not arged with murder, or theft, or lying, profanity, but with commercialism—quiring and using his money for his n selfish enjoyment only. And the me sin is shown in him who said to nself, "Soul, thou hast much goods d up for many years. Take thine se; eat, drink and be merry." God's ift reply was: "Thou fool, this night soul shall be required of thee." In s undue devotion to commercialism, ich Jesus condemned as covetousness, re than any other sin, we may learn mething from Japan, where the mer-ant ranks after the statesman, scholar, ldier, farmer and artisan. Then me the merchants, with only the "out-sts" below them. A statesman of pan said to an American, "We do not ke so much of arithmetic as you do.
e think it makes men sordid. We make more of history and philosophy." Certainly we should teach in all our homes and schools that there is no honor in gold, and that gold is not for pride but for helpfulness; not a rightful master but only a servant; not a god but a gift of God for the service of man.

Responsibility of Leadership

3. Individual responsibility to resist evil, however popular. Aaron's yielding to the popular demand that he should break the Second Commandment was hardly less guilty than Pilate's when he yielded to the popular demand that he should break the Sixth Commandment, for he who gives his supreme regard to anything else than to Him who so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, "crucifies the Lord afresh and puts him to an open shame." Let us show young men that in swearing, drinking, gambling, and in other popular vices, they are like Aaron, doing these things not because they regard them as right or even desirable, but because they haven't independence to do anything else. Most young men are like the great crowd at Babylon's political convention, that bowed together to Nebuchadnezzar's golden image. Who does not admire the three young Hebrews who, though in politics and looking for promotion, refused to yield and stood up for their principles in spite of the fiery furnace? Most young men do not dare to stand up against a popular evil, even when there is no furnace hotter than the sneers of cowards unworthy of consideration.

A Great Temperance Leader Gone

ONE of the most active workers in the cause of Gospel temperance in any country passed to the higher life when Francis Murphy died at his home in Los Angeles, Cal., on June 30. Mr. Murphy had not traveled widely in temperance campaigns for the last few years, but his interest in the cause was unabated; and his advice was constantly sought by pastors, evangelists, and committees that were engaged in the same battle with the drink traffic.

Mr. Murphy's life was a picturesque one. He was born in Ireland, April 26, 1836. When but a lad, he left Wexford to find home and fortune in America. He was at different times a clerk, a farm hand and a hotel keeper. At the outbreak of the war he enlisted in a New York volunteer regiment and served with credit while the conflict lasted.

It was in 1869 that Mr. Murphy became converted, at a time when his affairs were greatly involved and when he, as he stated himself, did not care whether he lived or died. He began to speak at local temperance meetings. His speeches, based on his own experience, had so much humor and pathos that they made a deep impression. Friends urged him to take up the cause of temperance as his life work.

His first lecture was given in Portland in 1871, and for many years he spoke several times a week, his tours taking him to England, Scotland and Ireland. As a result of his meetings thousands signed the pledge and wore the "blue ribbon." In Dundee the first man to sign the pledge was the provost of the city. Crowded meetings were held in all the large cities of Great Britain; and in Dublin, Ireland, the welcome given him was particularly enthusiastic.

In America there was not a city of any size that was not visited by Mr. Murphy, and there are many men who now hold respected and even prominent positions in their own communities who owe their success to the influence exerted on their lives by Mr. Murphy. He always insisted that temperance reformation in the individual, to be permanent, must be based on conversion to Christ; that "in God's strength alone is there for the drunkard any hope of fidelity to total abstinence."

ASK THE CHEF: He will say that he can make hundreds of wholesome, nourishing and appetizing "dishes" out of SHREDDED WHEAT.

You do not have to be a chef to enjoy SHREDDED WHEAT BISCUIT. It is ready-cooked, ready-to-serve. Delicious for breakfast or for any meal in combination with fruits, creamed meats or vegetables. Contains all the muscle-making, brain-building elements in the whole wheat grain, made digestible by steam-cooking, shredding and baking.

An ideal summer food—not so heating as corn or oats; contains more nutriment and is more easily digested.

A breakfast of SHREDDED WHEAT BISCUIT will supply the energy for work or play. TRISCUIT is the same as the Biscuit, except that it is compressed into a wafer. It is used as a Toast with butter, cheese or marmalades. It is an ideal food for flat-dwellers, light housekeepers, campers, for picnics, for excursions on land or at sea.

Why We Are Sacrificing These 1,400 Sets

¶ When we gave our first order to the binders, they submitted a Cover Design that we declined to accept; but before we could instruct them not to use it, nearly 1,400 sets had been bound. As the delay was ours, we received the books and paid for them. As our New Premiums are about to come in, we must close out this Stock in order to make room for our immediate requirements. Therefore we now Offer the Entire Balance (Regular Price $2.00) at the Absurdly Low Figure of 60 Cents for the Set, express charges to be paid by the purchaser.

¶ The Set Weighs nearly Five Pounds, and while it can be Delivered Anywhere in the United States on Prepayment of Forty Cents Charges, if the Purchaser resides within Reasonable Distance from New York City, Money can be Saved by having the books sent Charges Collect. Purchasers at a distance should send the Express Charges with the Order, as the low rate of forty cents can be secured only on prepaid shipments.

The Difference Between these Sets and the $2 Sets

¶ As far as type, paper and presswork are concerned, there is absolutely no difference whatever, the same sheets serving for both editions. The only difference is in the design used on the cover, which we considered too ornamental, and which was planned for colors instead of gold. To have offered both sets would have tended to confusion, hence we stored these books, temporarily, but now they must be sold. These sets are absolutely new, never having been removed from the original packing, and we guarantee them perfect, and, with the exception of the design explained above, duplicates in every sense of the word of our $2.00 Edition.

A Work that Should be in Every Library

Mr. Charles Noel Douglas, the compiler of Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, writes as follows concerning the Scope of this most Excellent Production:

¶ "In this work, the Independence Day Speaker, burning with patriotic ardor, can find numberless gems wherewith to enrich his oratorical flights. Here the enraptured swain and the lovelorn maid may drink at a literary fount of love that even Cupid himself might envy. In fact, there is scarcely a subject engaging the human mind, or an occasion, religious or secular, that has not been considered and garnished with a generous setting of appropriate quotations, and embodied in this work. In short, to the orator, the student, the man in the street, and to all lovers of literature, ancient and modern, poetic or prose, this work will be found to fill a long-felt want, and in its scope and general usefulness to be of inestimable value and absolutely indispensable."

2,000 Pages of Purest Honey

GATHERED FROM AMONG THE ROSES, CLOVER BLOSSOMS, GERANIUMS, VIOLETS, MORNING GLORIES, AND PANSIES OF LITERATURE

This great work, Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, has Placed the Whole Realm of Literature under Generous Tribute in order that its 2,000 Pages of Wit, Wisdom and Sentiment might be Invested with the Grace, the Lovliness, the Sparkle, and the Strength of the Literature of Every Age, Nation, Language, Clime and Sect.

Fourteen Hundred Different Topics, as wide in Scope as Human Thought Can Conceive, Embracing Every Subject that Stirs the Human Heart, or Engages the Human Mind, are Illumined from Every Point of View for the Information and Delectation of Reader, Thinker, Writer and Speaker.

Forty Thousand Quotations, whose Purity, Brilliancy, and Surpassing Worth have Already been Attested by Master Minds, are Garnered up in this Casket of Gems, to be used for Enrichment and Adornment of Lecture, Sermon, Conversation, Correspondence and Address.

No Library can Justly lay Claim to Completeness without a set of Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, and No Other Work Published can Serve as a Substitute, or Compare with it in Genuine and General Utility.

The Eighth International Red Cross Conference in Session in the British Capital

THE RED CROSS CONFERENCE

By MISS MABEL T. BOARDMAN

OF THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS

THE Eighth International Red Cross Conference has just been held in London, under the especial patronage of King Edward and Queen Alexandra, the latter being President of the British Cross Society. The first meeting was opened and led over by the famous Field Marshal, Earl Roberts. Among those on the tion committee were the Duchess of Montrose, the Marchioness of Lansdowne, Marchioness of Londonderry, the Countess of Dudley, Lord Rothschild, Lord , Lord Iveagh, Lord Burton, Sir Ernest Cassel, and Sir Frederick Treves, eon-in-Chief to the King. Twenty-eight nations were represented by one hun- and fifty-seven delegates. The uniforms of every civilized country were to be seen, from the resplendent snow-white and silver of the Prussian Life Guards, to the gorgeous plum-colored silk and scarlet robes of the Chinese mandarins. Japan, Siam, Persia and Turkey all had representatives, as did many of the South American republics and the Congo Free State.

Lord Roberts

Lord Roberts, in opening the Conference, said: "My Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen: Her Majesty the Queen has deputed me to receive you on this occasion, and to tell you with what pleasure Her Majesty, who takes the deepest interest in your great and useful work, is looking forward to welcoming you in person at Buckingham Palace on Saturday next. I need not say how highly I appreciate the honor thus placed upon me or the satisfaction it gives me to find myself in company with the representatives of so noble a society. I know what the Red Cross has done for the sick and wounded in time of war. We British soldiers appreciate most highly what was done during the war in South Africa. We rejoice that the Eighth Meeting of the International Conference is being held in London, and, while expressing our gratitude for what has been accomplished in the past, we cordially hope that the deliberations of the delegates may result in further developing the methods of alleviating the sufferings which are inevitable in a state of war. I will now read you a letter from Her Majesty the Queen:

"Buckingham Palace, June 9

"It is with the greatest pleasure that I, as President of the British Red Cross Society, welcome you all here on the occasion of the first international meeting on British soil. The delegates may be assured that they have my warmest and most heartfelt sympathy in their united endeavors to further still more the great scheme for relieving the sufferings of the sick and wounded in time of war, and I sincerely trust and believe that the present International Conference will be the means of carrying out in still greater perfection the noble aims of this great and good work.

"I am sure that the delegates will rejoice with me to know that there still lives amongst us the pioneer of the first Red Cross movement, Miss Florence Nightingale, whose heroic efforts on behalf of suffering humanity will be recognized and admired by all ages as long as the world shall last. Alexandra,

"Pres't of the British Red Cross Society."

Lord Roberts continued: "The next communication that I have the honor to read to you is a telegram from the Dowager-Empress of Russia:

"Gatschina, June 9.

"I beg your lordship to convey to the members of the Eighth International Conference of the Red Cross Society my best wishes for the success of their labors, of which the great and humane object has my most cordial sympathy. Marie."

A letter was also read from Miss Florencce Nightingale's secretary, expressing her deep interest and sympathy in the Red Cross work. After the reading of these communications Lord Roberts formally declared the Conference open d.

Officers were then elected, Col. William Cary Sanger, member of the Central Committee of the American National Red Cross, being selected as one of the vice-presidents. As all the rest of the meetings were conducted in French, the chair was occupied by the president of the French Red Cross, the charming Marquis

THE Enthroned Hero

TEXT: II. Tim. 4: 7:
"I have fought a good fight"

EVEN under the brightest and happiest conditions, it is a sad sight to see a great man unbuckle his armor and lay down the battle-ax he has wielded in the front of life's struggles. When John Adams was about to be inaugurated President of the United States, the assembled multitude had no cheers and vociferations for the new chieftain. Their thoughts were with the retiring leader. There were sobs and aching hearts for him who was to lay down the tasks of public life after forty-five years consecrated to his country's service. All eyes were focused upon the tall, commanding figure of him who would henceforth be known as "first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen." When John Adams lifted his hand over the sacred book and took the oath of office, George Washington slowly turned to go into the house and efface himself from public notice. The people followed him with moistened eyes and tear-stained cheeks. A great moan went over the assembled hosts, like the murmurings of many waters. He turned in the doorway and looked back a moment and then waved a silent farewell. And all up and down the lines went the valedictory "God bless him! God bless him! God bless him!"

The Veteran's Farewell

When Andrew Jackson handed over the reins of government to Martin Van Buren and started home, his journey to his beloved "Hermitage" was like a long funeral procession. The people came out from the towns and villages and cities to greet him. Every one wanted a last look at the face of their late ruler. With his white hair, tall, lithe form and stern features, he towered above the people who crowded around him. But wherever he looked, he saw only men and women who were regretting the day that this sagacious American was no longer to lead them in the councils of peace and of war.

When William E. Gladstone, after half a century in the service of his country, resigned the premiership and passed out of the House of Commons for the last time, all the members arose and uncovered. Those men, no matter to what political party they belonged, knew that a political genius and one of the most sagacious statesmen the British Empire had ever produced was about to leave the public arena and pass the Indian summer of his earthly life in retirement. His party knew that there was no one to fill his place, and they lamented his going.

After a great leader of men has been working for the good of his fellow countrymen for twenty, or thirty, or forty years, the world may regret to lose his services, but it has to bow to the inevitable and recognize the right of the tired worker to rest. "No! No!" says the world, "though we may grieve much to see our honored leaders fall out from their places, they have earned their rest and they have a right to peace." So we look upon the Mount Vernons and the Hermitages and the Hawardens as the havens and harbors of life, where tired men can rest and be at peace with those who love them and whom they love.

Death a Going Home

Now, the true Christian looks upon death as a going home to receive his eternal reward. When Paul said: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness," he meant simply this: "Friends, for years I have been engaged in an exhausting struggle. I am physically worn out. I am looking for the reward Christ promised. Let me go and be at peace with Christ, which is far better." So we have a right to look upon death to-day not as going down into the grave, but as ascending to a throne. It is going home. It is going to one of the mansions of heaven which Christ has prepared for those that love him.

I was never more impressed with this fact than when I sat by the bedside of the modern apostle of temperance, Francis Murphy. He was one of the great temperance leaders of this country. We mourned his failing strength. His work seemed to be so important. It did seem as though we could not give him up. But, as the time came for his departure, I visited him and prayed with him. Then after I had finished, with his weak voice he continued my prayer as follows: "O God, I thank thee that I have not an enemy in all the world. I thank thee that the world is filled with good people. If it be thy will, let me go back to my work. But if not, I have so many dear ones on the other side, take me to them and to thy glory." Yes, Francis Murphy, we know what was in your heart. Lying upon your sick-bed, you could see the dear departed friends coming out to greet you. You could hear the heavenly chorus chanting a welcome for your celestial advent. Your death was not to be an obliteration. It was to be an ascension, a coronation, an enthronement. Hail, thou ascended spirit! We to-day rejoice with thee in thy heavenly rapture. Hail, oh thou enthroned warrior! Hail!

A Restful Vision

When Stonewall Jackson, the chivalrous Philip Sidney of the Confederate Army, was dying, shot by the bullets of his own men at Chancellorsville, he had a beautiful vision of heaven. He saw a smooth-flowing river, where he could moisten his parched and fevered lips. He saw his loved ones on the opposite bank waving to him in salutation. And in rapture he raised himself and cried out, "Let us pass over to the other side and rest under the shade of the trees," and then fell back dead. So Francis Murphy, during his last days of earth, caught a glimpse of the trees of life growing by that river which is clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb. He wanted to go over and rest. He said, "There are so many dear ones beyond. O God, if it be thy will, take me to them and to thy glory." Yes, to-day thy prayer is answered. Thou art with thy departed kindred and friends. Thou wilt stay with them until the time comes for us to depart; and then thou wilt come forth to greet us as they came to greet thee.

Now, to-day I am not going to preach a funeral sermon. I am not going to sound a dirge or ring a death knell. But I am going to strike up a hallelujah chorus. If the cold lips of our loved friend could speak, I know he would have me do as I am doing. There was not a minor key in all his music. And so to-day, instead of talking about how bad we feel at his going, I am going to try to analyze the power of this one of the greatest temperance workers of our time, so that we may be encouraged in our work for the same Master and be stimulated to more vigorous effort by the example of this strenuous leader.

The Secret of Power

In the first place, I would place my finger upon the greatest source of Francis Murphy's power and tell you that the chief reason why this successful temperance worker won so many trophies for the abstinence cause was because he believed in the nobility of man. He believed that, no matter how flagrant the sins of a social outcast, no matter how low or vile a human being had become, deep down in that human heart were some remains of the image of God. Murphy never despaired of any human being, however drunken or degraded he might be. Here was a man, one of the race Christ came to save; and he believed that Christ could save him. The degrading obstacle of his thirst for liquor stood in the way and therefore Murphy tried to remove that, so that the power and influence of Christ could reach the poor, helpless creature.

It does not require very much genius to find flaws in a man's nature. It does not require wonderful erudition to magnify the faults of mankind. Any herd of swine can root out a flower garden, if it is possible for them to squeeze through a gap in the fence. It does not take much of a frost to kill all the fair apple-blossoms in the springtime; neither does it take much labor to develop a field of Canada thistles in the place where wheat and corn and barley ought to grow. But it does take the genius of a horticulturist to find latent buds and develop them. It does take agricultural acumen to put the right kind of fertilizer on the ground before the spring plowing. And it does take the marvelous grace of God to find the latent buds of purity and truth and love and honor in the corrupt heart of man, and to develop them aright for God. And always the work of a successful evangelist of This was the secret of Murphy's success. He be in Christ and he believed in men. Did not Crosby, the Christian hymnologist, have such a as this in mind when she wrote these impressive

> Down in the human heart, crushed by the tempter,
> Feelings lie buried that grace can restore;
> Touched by a loving heart, wakened by kindness,
> Chords that were broken will vibrate once more.

And parallel to this same line of thought w other fact which inspired Francis Murphy to see most depraved of men. He knew that the vict the intoxicating cup was in many cases a man saving. The very characteristics of the man tha led to his degradation—his geniality, his good-fello his friendliness—were the characteristics that make him a successful worker if he was delivered his thraldom. The intensity and zeal that made a persecutor were traits which made him a succ apostle when he was converted. And Francis M had arrived at this belief by looking at the hist his own life. Have you ever heard him describ tragedy of his wrecked home? When the Civil broke out, he, like other Irishmen, was eager to part in it. At the bugle call to arms, he shoul the musket and went to the front. He was not s by the enemy's bullets, but he was overthrown by

The Temptations of the Camp

Then, after the war was ended, in order to make ing for his little family, he took charge of a ho Maine. In other words, the devil knew the weakness and led him into the occupation that develop it. He put a whisky bottle into his han said to him, "Drink until your manhood is gone. until you come home to your wife and babies wit fierce passion of a brute. Drink until the vilest the gutter is no viler than you." And with that personality of his, he never did anything half way. drank until he went down, down, down into the depths of degradation. When the change came Murphy "came to himself" like the prodigal, he not forget the pit from which he had been lifted. he looked on the sodden, depraved wretches who brought to his meetings, he saw in them the Murph the gutter, and said to himself, "The power that ered me can deliver even these poor creatures," an went to work with confidence for the men's reforma Would to God that some of the men whom he wa strumental in saving might take up his work, and men might have reason to say, "The power of E doth rest on Elisha."

But there was another fact about his wonderful that has made Francis Murphy one of the gre temperance advocates of his time. He not only lieved in man, but he was ready to thank God fo the divine blessings with which he was surroun His whole life, after his conversion and consecratio the divine Master, was

A Continual Service of Praise

He always commenced his public services with Coronation Hymn; and he always closed with the I ology of "Praise God, from whom all blessings flo Wherever you met him, on the street, or in the h or in the church, or anywhere, the two words w were most often upon his lips were "Thank G Thank God! Thank God!" Sometimes, like a b ful boy, he would slip into my meetings hoping tha should not see him. He seemed to long sometime worship in the audience, and not be called to the pit. He would come in quietly and stay hidden u some word of Scripture or of prayer touched him; th before he knew it, a "Thank God!" would be ring from his church pew. Then every one would smile say: "That's Francis Murphy!" because no one co ever say "Thank God!" just as Francis Murphy During all his last sickness, in his delirium, he wo keep rubbing his hands, and with a sweet smile murmuring "Thank God!" Why, do you know I have heard him say "Thank God" so much that gue, member of the French Academy. Over six feet tall, erect as a boy, gray-ed but bright-eyed, this noble old Frenchman of seventy-eight years presided infinite courtesy, speaking in the graceful and beautiful French natural to istrious a writer.

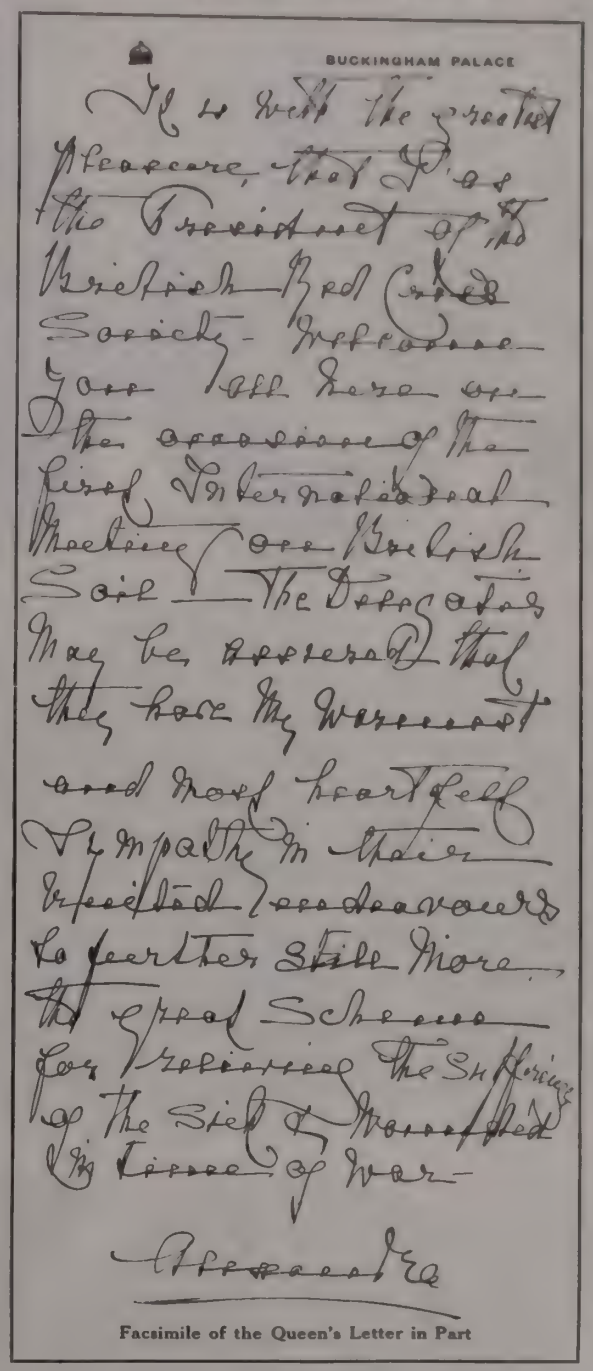
e subjects discussed were many, varied and most interesting. As Professor ens of Russia and Professor Renault of France, two renowned authorities on national law, were likewise the representatives of their respective govern-s at the Hague Peace Conference, and were here the latter part of the week, the subjects that desired to discuss were first taken up: the extend-f the provisions of the Geneva, or, as it is some-called, the Red Cross Treaty, to naval warfare, at hospital ships shall receive its full protection; uccor of prisoners of war by the Red Cross Soci-s, and the question of the abuse of the Red Cross and emblem. In speaking of the second subject, ressor Martens, who was in charge of this special Cross department during the Japanese-Russian said: "Indeed, by a happy innovation, the Jap-ne and Russian Prisoners Aid Societies of the Red s corresponded directly and regularly with reference e prisoners of war. The St. Petersburg office ed to over 17,000 inquiries for information and for-led some 55,000 letters and 7,000 postal packages. n Knesebeck, President of the German Red Cross, of the care given by this society to the Japanese ners when they passed through Germany to embark Hamburg home.

Professor Renault's address on the protection of Red Cross name and insignia, he urged upon all tries that they provide proper legislation to protect name and insignia of the Red Cross from being used rademarks, for advertising and similar purposes.

eneral Priou made a most interesting report on "The e and Role of Women in Medical Columns and spitals in Time of War." He told of the splendid k of the nearly 8,000 Russian Red Cross nurses, ittle Sisters," as they were affectionately called by soldiers, many going even with the ambulances, osed to the fire of the enemy; he told also of the ble service of the 4,000 Japanese Red Cross nurses.

The German Red Cross sent in a printed report over two hundred pages with many illustrations the great work it is doing to combat the terrible urge of tuberculosis. The Italian Red Cross gave ount of its valuable labors after the serious earth-ake of Calabria, when tent hospitals were promptly ted in fifty-eight localities, and after the eruption Vesuvius, when, within twenty-four hours and still der the rain of lava and ashes, two hospitals were tablished with ambulances, litters and complete medi-l and surgical supplies.

The Russian and Japanese Red Cross Societies had ost valuable and full reports of the marvelous work ch had accomplished during the late war. The Rus-an Red Cross in its hospitals alone cared for 241,756 k and wounded, not counting the great numbers that ere transported in its fifteen hospital trains. The panese Red Cross, which has nearly 1,300,000 mem-ers in its society, whose annual dues last year amounted $1,285,533, expended over $2,500,000 for its relief ork, and assisted in the care of 225,000 in the home ospitals, 688,000 at the front and 185 on the hospital ips, of whom over 25,000 were Russian prisoners.



BUCKINGHAM PALACE

It is with the greatest pleasure that I, as President of the British Red Cross Society, welcome you all here on the occasion of the first International Meeting ever held in Great Britain. The Delegates may be assured that they have my warmest and most heartfelt sympathy in their splendid endeavours to lessen still more, the great sum of the sufferings of the Sick & Wounded in time of War.

Alexandra R.

Facsimile of the Queen's Letter in Part

The American Red Cross report told of the San Francisco relief work, of the assistance rendered to the famine sufferers in Japan and China, material mention being made of the great generosity of the contributors to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S funds for this relief, as shown by the very large amounts forwarded by this paper through the Red Cross. The kindest hospitality was shown the delegates by Most English hosts in the way of luncheons, dinners and receptions. The American Ambassador and Mrs. Reid, who have always taken the deepest interest in the Red Cross, gave a great reception at Dorchester House for all the delegates, and on Saturday a reception was given by the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace, at which the delegates were each presented in person. Slight, fair, almost girlish looking, the sweet-faced Queen, dressed in purple velvet, went from delegate to delegate, talking of her interest in the Red Cross and His Majesty, looking well and hearty in his buff and red uniform, welcomed in English, French or German the representatives of the various countries.

Baron Ozawa, vice president of the Japanese Red Cross, entertained the delegates one evening with stereopticon views and a description of the Red Cross work during the war. A view was also given of Baron Ozawa and other Red Cross officials visiting the famine district in northern Japan, to inspect the relief work for which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD contributed so largely. After this interesting address was over, it was to the delegates of the American Red Cross that Baron Ozawa kindly presented the views that had been used.

In connection with the Red Cross Conference, a remarkable exhibition of appliances for the transportation of wounded was held. Three prizes were presented of $3,000 each from the interest of a fund given for this purpose by the Dowager Empress of Russia for the best new inventions. One of the exhibits which attracted the Queen's particular attention and that of many others was a pair of dogs, trained by Major Richardson to search for the wounded hidden in places where they might be overlooked by the stretcher-bearers. These dogs, a cross between collies, bloodhounds and foxhounds, wear bands about their bodies on which is the Red Cross and in whose pockets are stimulants and first-aid packages. After finding the wounded man, the dog is trained to return to the stretcher-bearers and lead them to the spot where the man is lying. Of the dogs used in the late war the Russian report says: "In finding the wounded and missing with whom the millet fields were strewn, nothing succeeded like our seven dogs. In our last skirmish, twenty-three men were found by them who would otherwise have been lost." The dogs are taught to quarter the ground like setters working after partridges, and are almost infallible in finding wounded men.

Nothing reveals more the horrors of war than the Red Cross reports and its exhibitions of trains, ambulances, litters and other appliances to mitigate suffering.

An invitation was extended by the American National Red Cross to the Central Committees of the other Red Cross Societies to hold the next International Conference in 1912 in the United States, and it is highly probable that this invitation will be accepted. Long before this, it is hoped that our people will be aroused to such an interest in and enthusiasm for this wonderful and noble organization that in 1912 we may prove by the size, strength and system of our American Red Cross that we are not any longer behind the other peoples of the world in our patriotism and humanity.

elieve he got me into the same glorious habit of hanking God for everything. And whereas I used to ount my troubles and name them one by one, now, nder the influence of that sainted spirit, I have begun o count my blessings. And as my blessings are crowd-ng me, I am saying: "Thank God!"

But, leaving aside these personal incidents, we would ake a step forward and analyze the direct cause of his uccess as a temperance reformer. How did Francis lurphy win thousands and tens of thousands to the etter life? Through continually, emphatically, and verwhelmingly driving home to the sinful heart man's irect responsibility to God. He was always saying: 'Christ came to save you. Christ will save you. Christ ill save you now. By his help, will you come forward nd sign the pledge, and make a covenant with Christ?" Ie did not bother much about prohibitive laws. He id not work much through legislative halls. But he ied to bring the sinful heart of man in close touch ith a loving and forgiving Saviour.

Now, we have been hearing a great deal about the emperance work of this day. We have heard about he Prohibition movement, and the Anti-Saloon move-ent, and the Women's Temperance organizations, and hey are all good. No one wished all these different movements God speed more than did Francis Murphy. But though Francis Murphy was in sympathy with any movement that would help stop the liquor evil, he put the chief emphasis of his labors upon bringing the individual man in touch with Christ, and saving man as an individual and not in the bulk. And Francis Murphy was right. This world will never be saved from the curse of intoxicating drink through the legislative halls of our State and national capitals. If it is to be saved at all, it must be saved by the saving power of Christ, and the influence of the pledge. Do you suppose you could make this a Christian nation merely by passing strict Sabbatic laws, or by building new churches on every street corner? No. Temperance laws are right in themselves. But after all, the mightiest work of the temperance reformers of the future is to do what John B. Gough did and Jerry McAuley did and Samuel Hadley did and Francis Murphy did, and that is, to bring sinful man by the old-fashioned pledge in touch with the saving grace of Christ.

But there is one more thought that forces itself upon us. Francis Murphy became the successful temperance reformer he was, because no sooner did he win a convert and get a man to sign the pledge, than at once he got that man on his feet and brought him to the platform and made him go to work and save other drunkards. No sooner did Francis Murphy get a Gospel grip upon a man, than at once he pulled him upon his feet and made him go to work for temperance. Can we not to-day learn that divine lesson? Can we not learn that we are developed spiritually not more by what Christ does for us than by what we are willing to do for Christ?

Have we met here simply to say a few pleasant words about our departed loved one? Nay. If I might not seem irreverent, I would say that we should feel in this service as the disciples of old must have felt when they were in the upper chamber in Jerusalem awaiting the coming of the Holy Spirit after the ascension of Christ from Mount Olivet. They were not there to mourn their departed Master. They were there to get inspiration for their work. So it should be with us when any successful worker drops out of the ranks. His labor is finished, but the work is not completed. Who will take it up and carry it forward? May we consecrate our lives to the great temperance work as never before! May we say, "God helping me, I will live for the purpose of saving men clear down in the mire of sin, as I have never done before!" Do you say that? Then, my friends, I think the spirit of Francis Murphy is descending upon us.

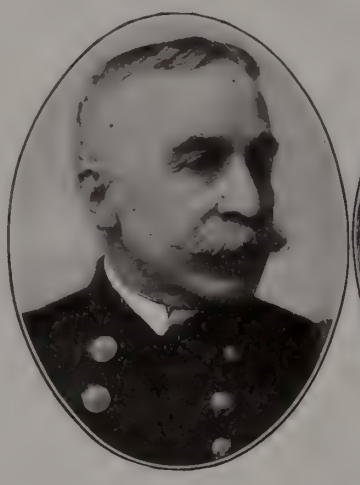
THE GREAT PACIFIC CRUISE

WITH sixteen great white hulls cutting sharply through the blue of the Atlantic, and with high funnels belching clouds of black smoke, America's fleet of powerful battleships will soon head out to sea on its long cruise to the Pacific. It will be the most powerful fleet assembled beneath the Stars and Stripes, as well as one of the largest gathered by any naval Power in Pacific waters.

This cruise is not the result of any vague alarm felt by our government in regard to our relations with any other government that has interests in the Pacific, nor can it be construed as an act of hostility on the part of the United States. Several years ago the Pacific was stripped of our battleships. With the exception of a few cruisers in the Philippines, and a few gunboats near China and Behring Strait, the entire American fleet was transferred to our Atlantic seaboard. Although everything seemed serene and there were no clouds on the international horizon, many naval officers held that the removal of our warships was unwise.

Last winter it was decided by the Naval Board, of which Admiral Dewey is the head, that some of the ships should be sent back to the Pacific stations. More recently it was decided to send an entire fleet of American battleships, sixteen in number. This, in turn, seemed to be stripping the Atlantic coast of its defenders; but though the heaviest ships will leave on the cruise, there will be many large cruisers and gunboats left on this side—enough for any emergency that might arise during the absence of Admiral Evans' fleet. According to military and naval experts, the fleet in the Pacific should be the larger.

On the Atlantic side, it is hard to conceive of any complication in the near future that would bring us into armed conflict with any European Power, and Major-General Frederick Dent Grant, who commands at Governor's Island, in New York Harbor, says that our coast defenses are strong enough to hold at bay any foreign fleet that might try to reach one of our larger cities, such as New York or Boston. Our great outside interests are now in the Pacific. There is the growth of our Eastern commerce to be considered and our island possessions of Hawaii and the Philippines, and many others dotted about the Pacific, with their telegraph and coaling stations, all of which have been without any protection whatsoever. Among other objects it is desired by our naval department to show Europe and Asia how quickly and efficiently America can transfer her fleet from one coast to another. One rumor has it that part of the fleet may be returned after the officers and men have received the benefit of the practice and maneuvers incident to a long cruise with enough ships to work out tactical problems.



Admiral Dewey

Secretary Metcalf, of U. S. Navy

Rear-Admiral Evans

At the present writing, the course to be taken by the ships is undecided. If the fleet were to go straight to the Philippines, it would be advisable to sail across the Atlantic to Gibraltar, then through the Mediterranean, through the Suez Canal, the Red Sea, the Indian Ocean, and then eastward to the islands. The route around Cape Horn through the Straits of Magellan seems to be the one that will more likely be taken. One reason for this is the fact that the navy could be used to cement the rapidly growing friendship between the South American States and this country. A year ago Secretary Root made a remarkable journey through S. America. He was entertained at all the capitals an was cordially greeted wherever he appeared. The would stop at all the ports visited by the secretary. would be the most remarkable compliment paid by United States to any other government, and could fail to greatly please our southern neighbors.

There is a small minority in the United States t contend that the government should not send wars to the Pacific, as it may irritate Japan; yet all the J anese officials who have gi interviews unite in declar that Japan would certai have no objection, as the P fic, in great part, is "Ameri water." As another put it would be merely drilling in own yard. Every nation rec nizes America's right to tra fer her fleet as she pleases, that it has caused some s prise to the Japanese that portion of the American pub feel nervous about the crui Ambassador Aoki and A miral Yamamoto, who was Se retary of the Japanese Na during the late war with R sia, both scout the idea of w breaking out between Ameri and their country.

Admiral Yamamoto arriv recently in this country, it b ing his purpose to investiga American naval methods. "W want peace," were his first words on landing. "W can't forget that America has shown our country friend feeling for many years." When asked by an America what he thought of the Pacific cruise, he said: "Th question is entirely one of your country." Command Kato, his aid, also said that they did not regard it as menace. "We quite understand that it is an America affair." Admiral Evans, who is to command the flee had a cordial interview with Admiral Yamamoto, an they posed for what they called their "peace photograph.

The Japan Society of New York City, composed prominent men in all walks of life who have visited th Land of the Rising Sun, gave a banquet to the Ambas sador and Admiral. The speeches were all on the them of a friendly solution of the difficulties.

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF A DEACONESS

A Touch of Human Sympathy

Flowers for the Street Waifs

Visiting a Lonely Home

IF Miss Lucy Rider Meyer, Superintendent of the Chicago Deaconess Home and Training School, was asked to define the duties of a trained deaconess, she would be puzzled to itemize her reply. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do," is a phrase which interprets the standard of daily living in this branch of the Methodist Episcopal Church, under whose jurisdiction many score of consecrated women are devoting themselves to a service which proves that "the way to God is by the road of men."

To be human and in need of a friend are all the requirements a deaconess asks in order to command her loving ministry. From childhood, born to a grim heritage of want, down to solitary, helpless old age, the abodes of poverty are brightened by the cheery words and helpful deeds of these who may be truly called "Sisters of Mercy."

Our illustrations afford a glimpse of the many-sided work which each day brings. The thin hands of the little ones who search for scraps along the railroad tracks show their dire need of nourishing food. But they are not too hungry or too cold to show by their smiles of greeting their appreciation of the presence of their friend, perhaps the only good and helpful woman who has ever entered their barren lives. Leaving a ray of sunshine as she passes, the good deaconess hastens on to carry courage into the gloomy home of old age, and the poor creature whom she seeks finds unspeakable comfort in pouring the sorrows of a lifetime into the sympathetic ear of this friend whom God has sent to cheer her solitude and to supply her material needs as well.

Flowers perform a beautiful mission among the children of the tenement districts. Whether plucked by kindly hands in garden or meadow, the baskets which reach the noisy, sweltering, unclean streets where poverty abides are quickly emptied of their fragrant burdens. Newsboys, street urchins of every degree, even little girls of the more prosperous class, gather eagerly around the trim, uniformed figure of the bearer of the blossoms, clamoring for "just one flower, please, sister."

If the good people whose lives are passed in the wide reaches of God's country, better understood the joy which one bright-hued flower gives to a tenement child, there would be more of the floral messengers of love sent to the great cities for distribution.

A beneficent work carried on under the direction of the Chicago Training School (4949 Indiana Avenue) is that of the Deaconess Orphanage at Lake Bluff, Illinois. Hundreds of desolate little orphans are gathered within the pleasant Home, where they soon grow well and happy. Here, as everywhere in philanthropic work, the children form an especially delightful and promising department of missionary effort, shadowed only by the inevitable sadness which arises at the thought of the many needy ones shut out by lack of room.

MR. WM. F. JUNKIN, a relief worker in the great China famine, has sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this remarkable group of photographs taken during a recent tour in Suchien, one of the districts where the suffering was most severe. These photographs show the dejection of the starving people before the arrival of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief cargo. A very large proportion of the food distributed in the earlier stages of the famine was procured through contributions forwarded by this journal, flour and other foodstuffs being bought by the relief committees and apportioned to the different districts by the Missionary Committee at Chinkiang. Mr. Junkin, in these illustrations from life, has shown new aspects of the famine. There is something tragic as well as pitiful in the long double line of supplicants—a veritable "bread-line"—standing patiently with their willow baskets, waiting for the opening of the relief station, when life-giving food will be given to all who are fortunate enough to have tickets. We see the groups of aged; the weary mothers and the little babies in their queer-looking padded garments; the mountainous pile of flour-sacks (there were at Suchien four piles like that in the photograph) and the sudden change to activity when the wheelbarrows are loaded to overflowing with well-filled sacks and sent out for distribution at stations long distances apart. Who can tell of the joy and the reviving hope in those suffering homes to which the flour was sent? One need only look at the drawn, haggard faces of the victims to guess what a transformation a bag of flour would bring about in such a home!

Governor Vardaman's Choice

SOME weeks ago it was announced very generally in the daily newspapers that Governor James K. Vardaman of Mississippi, at a Gospel meeting held in Jackson, Miss., on June 25, had come forward with a number of others to the altar and publicly declared his acceptance of Christ as Saviour. This particular service was conducted by Rev. Dr. Cates, a Southern evangelist, and the newspaper accounts added that when the Governor, in a voice clearly audible to all in the auditorium, said: "I surrender all to Jesus for salvation and service," many of those present wept for joy.

These statements, the substance of which was reproduced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, are now denied by the Governor. It is true, he admits, that he went to the mourners' bench, and knelt there while the evangelist prayed; "but," the Governor hastens to add, "when a call was made to penitents to surrender to Christ, I did not surrender. I so stated to the clergyman and stepped behind the line of converts. I attended several other meetings, but did not join the penitents."

Of course, no one knows so well as Governor Vardaman himself what his object was in kneeling at the mourners' bench. He is entitled to his denial, but there are probably few who will not wish, for the Governor's own sake, that it had been otherwise. He may have been only "half persuaded." His frankness now compels the belief that his motive in going forward was a sincere one.

If the Governor, after yielding to the spiritual impulse which led him to go forward, regretted it or was ashamed of it immediately afterward, his condition is certainly not one to be envied. There are many distinguished Americans who have not been too proud to kneel at the feet of the lowly Nazarene and acknowledge him as Master and Redeemer. The late President McKinley, on May 26, 1899, declared such allegiance over his own signature; and at the same time practically the entire Cabinet, the Supreme Court, and many senators, representatives, governors, generals, admirals, and men eminent in other walks of life made similar avowal. We do not recall one of the whole number in this extraordinary list who was ashamed to confess Christ before men. That confession did not detract from their greatness in the eyes of the nation. On the contrary, people of all shades of religious and political opinion loved and respected them the more. Our people were glad to know that Christian men were at the helm of affairs, and that God ruled in the nation's councils.

We respect Governor Vardaman's frankness. He is not the kind of man, we think, who would make a stump speech denying his conversion, just for the sake of gratifying inquisitive auditors. Certainly there is not in this broad enlightened land to-day any community where such a denial would not awaken regret rather than rejoicing. Let us hope that the work of grace begun in the Governor's heart may yet be completed, and that some day in the near future may find him in the camp of those who never hesitate to run up their colors and declare their spiritual allegiance, believing the promise of Him who said: "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man also confess before the angels."

Foolish "Jingoism"

IT was a fortunate coincidence that, just as the foolish and sensational stories of friction between the United States and Japan had about reached the climax of absurdity, Admiral Baron Yamamoto, Japan's ex-Minister of the Navy, should have arrived on these shores. Admiral Yamamoto, who was at the head of the Imperial Naval Board which planned the famous campaign in the Japan Sea and against Port Arthur, is one of the most distinguished sons of Nippon who have ever visited this country. In his own land, he is regarded as a foremost authority on maritime law.

The Admiral neatly and effectually punctured the misrepresentations of the "jingoes," when he declared that the statesmen and people of Japan could not forget the warm friendship America has shown their country for many years—a friendship which his nation valued and which could not be broken by a passing storm. One sensational journal in Tokio had caused annoyance by its misrepresentations; but it was a paper without influence. It has been rebuked and now publicly disclaims its former statements. Taking its experience as a text, the Admiral, in a very courteous way, gave a little timely advice to American newspapers, which it may be well to remember. He said:

> I want to impress upon the editors of the newspapers that they cannot be too careful what they write. They must understand the conditions of the two countries thoroughly before they write. There are sensational newspapers in Japan as well as America, and it is a pity that they do not attempt to understand conditions before they put them down upon paper.

Naturally, we suppose there are many who will resent as superfluous advice from such a quarter; yet this does not affect the essential point, which is—that the advice is excellent. If it were followed, the present excitement would soon die out and be forgotten.

A Novel Ceremony

HOW close is the union between religion and temperance was shown recently in Colorado. The signing of bills by the Governor of a State is usually a simple and informal duty; but Governor Buchtel of Colorado made the signature of a law the occasion of a religious service. The law to be signed was the Local Option Law, which grants to any city, town, or district of the State the right of a majority of the citizens to say whether intoxicating liquor shall be sold within the borders of that district. So important and beneficial did the Governor consider the law, so fraught with the promise of good things, that he made the completion of the legislation by his act, a subject of praise and prayer to God.

Incidentally, too, the Governor made the occasion an opportunity of showing the solidarity of all religious teachers in moral principles. He issued an invitation to "all ministers, priests and rabbis" to meet in the hall of the House of Representatives and join in the service of praise. The response from Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews was very cordial. However widely their tenets differ, they were a unit in opposition to the ruinous and demoralizing traffic which this law was enacted to restrain. After prayer, the responsive reading of the Scriptures and the singing of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," the Governor affixed his signature to the new act, the first Local Option law ever adopted in the history of the State. Another hymn of praise and another prayer completed the simple ceremony.

Hearty congratulations are due to Colorado and its Governor on the placing of such a law on the statute book. We most earnestly hope that citizens in many sections of the State will avail themselves of the right conferred by the law. Perhaps the increased cleanliness and decreased noise and disorder which will naturally result in those districts may encourage other sections to make the experiment, and so the State may be bright with many oases of purity and sobriety.

Spiritual Eyesight

IT is a great thing to have good eyesight, the ability to see objects clearly and distinctly. It is surprising how many people have defective sight. What with astigmatism, and inequality of focusing in the two eyes, and insufficiency of upward or downward rotation, and all the other abnormalities that oculists are acquainted with, absolutely good eyes are comparatively rare.

There are not a few also who have defective spiritual eyesight—for there is an eye of the soul as well as of the body; and it is this to which our Lord refers in his saying about the single eye, and the evil eye. Singleness of purpose is essential to unity of aim and effort in life. The seeing of one thing clearly as the object of life, and the pursuit of that steadily, gives one the satisfaction which comes from a definite unity in all one's undertakings; just as a man of clear bodily eyesight is sure of his course, and walks confidently on. On the other hand, that life is continually distracted which fails to perceive one thing clearly, and to aim at that as the object of pursuit. In matters of worldly concern this difference is frequently exemplified. Some men know just what they want, and devote their energies to its attainment. They are the men of single eye in the pursuit of worldly good. They are apt to be the successful men from a worldly point of view. Others vacillate in their ideas and purposes, with the result that but little is accomplished in any direction.

If we carry this principle to the higher sphere of the devotion of activity to the true object of life, we see that it works in the same way. Many people are distracted by the solicitations of the various objects which appeal to them as promising good. There is money, which swereth all things," and most emphatically doe declare that every good is included in its posses There is social prestige, which declares with much c dence that the great thing in life is to be "in the swi There is political preferment, which declares in voice of ambition that nothing can equal the posses of place and power. There is the gratification of l rious tastes, which tells us, with siren solicitation, of delights of ease, the pleasures of sense, the joys decent or indecent epicureanism.

But all such aims as these are lacking in power to c mand the hearty approval of the moral faculties. is made for something higher. And everybody sees t but not everybody sees it with singleness of vis Those other unworthy objects obtrude themselves. that we are apt to see double. It is only the single that has a distinct perception of that which is true right as the object of life. But how shall the "dou vision" be corrected?

When one consults an oculist about an error of eyes, he tries different lenses until he finds one t meets the case, and that lens is prescribed as the pro corrective. When one's moral vision is not clear, it be well to pursue the same course. Try the lens of y hope of immortality. Look through that at the obje about you. It may be just the lens that will enable y to see clearly to make your way through the otherw bewildering maze of this passing earthly scene. Or, the lens of the spirituality of your nature, of which y are more or less conscious. Bring this to bear in t power. Perhaps this will clear up the scene you lo upon, so that you will be able to distinguish the t from the false, the worthy objects of pursuit from unworthy. Or, try the lens of an appreciation of y place in creation, as designed for highest uses in Go plan concerning you. This may enable you to see clea the course of life to be pursued.

The great thing, plainly, is to get rid of the blur a confusion of the double moral vision with which so ma are afflicted. If we only had the single eye, enabling at all times to see moral objects distinctly, we should be making the mistakes which are so common and whi lead to the undoing of so many. The moral vision nee to be unified, and when this is done the persevering use the clarified vision will strengthen the sight. The ocul says to his patient: Use your glasses constantly, and yo eyes will grow strong, and become confirmed in th clearer sight. In like manner, we must persevere in usi the glass of truth that has cleared up our moral visio and so we shall become confirmed in our perception a following of the true and the right.

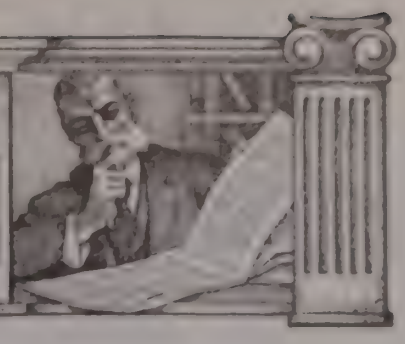
THE BIBLE and the NEWSPAPER



To Explore the Antarctic

NEAR the end of this month a start is to be made by the expedition to the unknown region around the South Pole. The Nimrod, on which the expedition will sail, is now fitting out on the Thames. S was formerly a Newfoundland sealer, but has undergo changes to fit her for her new duties. A high poop, a uare-rigged foremast and crow's nest are among the nges made in her condition. She will carry about three hdred tons of coal for her engine. The commander of t expedition is Lieut. E. H. Shackleton, who was an er in Capt. R. F. Scott's expedition to the Antarctic fi years ago. He has, therefore, the advantage of kwing as much of the atic conditions of the on as is known. That kwledge is not great, for wle many explorers have etrated the Arctic circle, Antarctic has been lected.

The present programme is the Nimrod to proceed New Zealand and remain Lyttleton, completing equipment until Novem-. Thence she will proed to King Edward's nd, where the expedition, sisting of twelve men, ll be landed. The Nim- will then return, and ve the party to pursue loration for two years. e will return in 1909, to bring them back to civilizan. The expedition has two novel features among its uipment. One of these is a herd of hardy Siberian nies, which are said to be as capable of resisting the ors of the climate as the Esquimaux dogs, while they e stronger and faster. Another novelty is an autobile specially constructed for the service. It is operated a spirit guaranteed to work satisfactorily in the lowest mperatures. The machine has three sets of wheels for e on surfaces of different degrees of hardness. The tomobile is regarded as purely experimental, and its ilure, if it should fail, will not embarras the expedition. ledges, and a portable boat to navigate the waters, ould any be found, will be the means of locomotion n which the party will rely.

The expedition takes with it a portable house in which he days and nights of the long winter will be passed fter the Nimrod has returned. The house is to be built n low piles, and its walls, ceiling, and floor are f wood. In each case they will be double, the pace between the inner and outer erections beng stuffed with wool. There will be an additional lining to the walls, as the cases of prosions and stores, being made of one size, can be tacked against the walls, thus making another arrier between the men within and the intense old without.

Lieut. Shackleton, who will command the expedition, is one of the three men who hold the record of farthest south. With Commander Scott and Dr. Wilson, Lieut. Shackleton in 1902 penetrated to latitude 82.17, which is about five hundred and fifty miles from the Pole. No one has as yet penetrated the region, so that the expedition will encounter perils as yet unknown. That there are human beings there is considered improbable. The vast region, whether it be land, or water, or ice, is a region of silence and solitude. Yet even there the explorers may realize that God is present, and they may look up to him in their emergencies, assured that he can hear them even in that desolation and darkness, for it is the creation of his hand.

As for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them; the north and the south thou hast created them. (Psalm 89: 11, 12).

A Physician's Promise

Two brothers residing at Corning, N. Y., had through life been deeply attached to one another. One of them was a banker and the other a physician. The banker died on July 2 at the age of seventy-six. The physician is two years younger, and is now suffering from a disease that prevents him ever rising from his bed. Many years ago the banker confided to his brother that he had a continual dread that he might be buried alive, and extracted a promise from him that if the physician survived him he would personally apply every known test before permitting him to be buried. The physician gave his sacred promise, and when he was informed of his brother's death, he determined to fulfil it though he could not leave his bed. The body was accordingly brought to his bedside, and there by his direction careful and painstaking examination was made, the physician watching the results. Half an hour was spent in the closest scrutiny, and then the physician signed the order for his brother's interment. There was nothing else to be done. The physician had kept his promise and had personally ascertained that his brother was really dead. How glad he would have been, if he had found the faintest spark that medical science could have fanned into life! Everything that could have been done to revive him would have been done. Unhappily we cannot say as much when it is spiritual life that is in question. The Christian is not always so personally concerned to ascertain if his brother is alive in Christ, otherwise some might be brought into contact with the quickening power.

Wherefore he saith, awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light. (Eph. 5: 14.)

A Beneficial Fall

A singular result of a fall is reported by a journal of Utica, N. Y. Three years ago a young man was injured by the fall of a heavily laden elevator on which he was riding. He was taken to a hospital, where for some time grave fears of his death were felt. He gradually recovered, but his right leg was completely paralyzed, and after trying several remedies, the surgeons said he would never regain the use of it. The patient stayed some months longer in the hospital undergoing treatment. Finally, he abandoned hope, and convinced that he would never go around again without crutches. He went home and looked about for a source of livelihood. His former employers made an arrangement to compensate him, and with the money he bought a horse. Returning home after the purchase, he sat in the rear of a wagon holding his horse by a halter. The horse made a sudden stop, and the young man was pitched from his seat on the wagon. His companion stopped the wagon and ran to his assistance thinking he was seriously hurt. Instead, he declared that leaving and returned to his dead limb. He had felt something stop in it, and he could move his foot slightly as he had not been able to do for a year. He was taken back to the hospital, and it is now believed that he will completely recover the use of his leg. The surgeons say that some dislocation had occurred, which his fall from the wagon had remedied. If he was a believer in luck, he would think, when he was dragged from the wagon, that his run of ill-luck was persisting. He is not the first who has found that an apparent calamity has been the source of blessing. The Christian will find, when he reaches that land in which all mysteries are made plain, that all his misfortunes were sent in mercy.

Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness. (Heb. 12: 11.)

The Unexplored Region Around the South Pole

A Fireman's Surgery

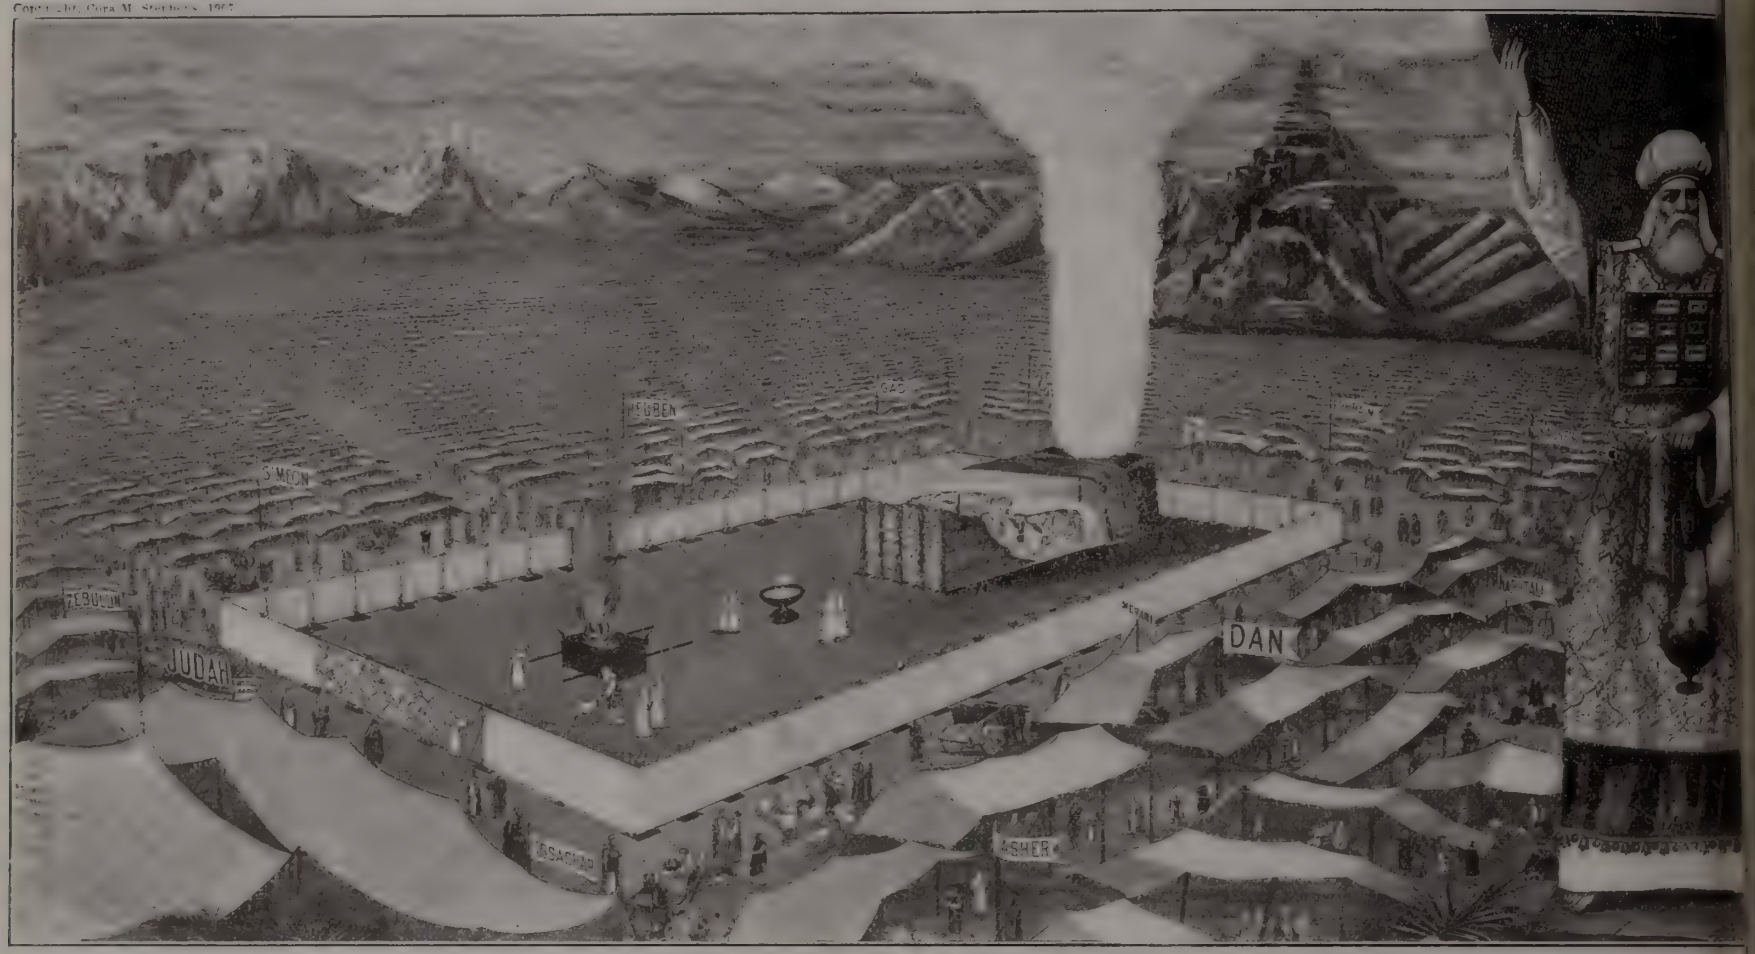
Cheers from his fellow firemen greeted one of a company in Brooklyn, N. Y., recently when the success of his service to a favorite horse was demonstrated. There had been a collision between the fire-engine on the way to extinguish a fire and a trolley car at a street corner. The car was overturned and under it was one of the engine's horses. When the horse was released, he was in torture. His eyeballs were cut with the broken windows of the car and filled with cinders. He was led back to the engine-house, his shivers showing the pain he endured. A veterinary surgeon, hurriedly summoned, pronounced a cure impossible at that stage, and said the horse would never see again. He went away and the men gathered sorrowfully about the suffering animal. One of them, who had been his driver for a year past, determined at least to alleviate the poor beast's agony. He went out and procured some drugs and warm water. With a clean sponge he stood at the horse's head and bathed the injured eyeballs. The animal winced, but he seemed to know that an effort was being made to help him and he resolutely bore the pain. There were no fire-calls during the night and the man stayed by his patient, bathing his eyes and washing out the grit as gently as a hospital nurse. When the morning came, the veterinary called and was told what had been done. He examined the eyes and declared that they would recover. "You have saved his sight," he said. "Keep him in the dark for a day or two and he will be all right. I should not have thought it possible." Then the cheer went up from the group of firemen, who loved the horse, and admired the patience of their comrade who had saved him from blindness. The fireman was not as learned as the veterinary surgeon, nor as skilful, but he had the most powerful of all tools—love for the patient. That is the most potent of all means of service. Many a sinner has been won for Christ through the love of a mother, after the minister, the church and society have abandoned hope of him.

Love suffereth long, and is kind ... beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things. (1 Cor. 13: 4, 7 R. V.)

THE GOSPEL IN PICTURES

INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

Copyright, Cora M. Stephens, 1907



THE TABERNACLE IN THE WILDERNESS SURROUNDED BY THE TENTS OF THE TRIBES

It is difficult to understand from Exodus 26, where the Tabernacle is described, what was the exact shape and appearance of it. The above picture is the conception of Mr. W. E. Stephens, who has devoted some years to the study of the subject. The sacred tent, surrounded by its courts, is seen in the centre of the vast host, which encamped around it in the order arranged, under divine command, by Moses. It was taken down by the Levites whenever the people removed to a new stopping-place, and the bearers of every part of the hallowed furniture were appointed by law. The bearers of the boards, the curtains and the sacred vessels are specified in the fourth chapter of Numbers.

ALL Israel dwelt in tents, and God therefore ordered a tent for himself, that his people might know that he was in their midst. He gave the pattern for it, with all details of construction and furnishing, to Moses on the mount. It was to be made all glorious within by richly embroidered curtains in blue, purple and scarlet. But outwardly it was to look like the rough tents of the people, save that it was larger and in the centre by itself. Over the golden boards, of which only a small part would be visible, was a covering of goat's-hair cloth and rams' skins dyed red, so that the outer appearance of God's tent was a combination of gold, white and scarlet, with seal-skins also covering a part of the roof.

The people must be taught, as at Sinai, that while they might come close to God's dwelling-place, there must be a limit; and so God gave Moses directions for enclosing a court round about his tent by curtains of white linen with embroidered portieres at the front, all to cover a space of one hundred and fifty feet by seventy-five feet. The tent itself was to be forty-five feet long and fifteen feet wide and to be divided into two parts, one fifteen feet square and the other thirty by fifteen, to be divided by a gloriously beautiful curtain, embroidered in blue, purple and scarlet. It will be seen that the tabernacle was not bigger than many a Sunday School class-room.

Tabernacle Furniture

The furnishings of God's tent were to be an altar of wood overlaid with brass for sacrifice, and a laver of brass for the court, and a seven-branched lampstand or candlestick of beaten gold, a table of acacia wood overlaid with gold, and an altar, also of wood and gold, in the larger room. In the smaller room but one piece of furniture, and that a box of acacia wood with a cover of beaten gold, with two images of cherubim resting upon the top of it, between which should rest the fiery pillar in which God was accustomed to reveal himself to his people.

God showed himself most forgiving concerning the golden calf, in that he gave the people through Moses an opportunity to give their ornaments of gold and other treasures for the building of his tent. And he also invited their loving service in making the tent beautiful. Not only this, but to some he gave the special gift of working in gold and silver, and to others that of working in bronze, and to others the skill to embroider. With glad hearts the people gave their treasures and their labor, and in about one year they had it ready to set up. What a day was that in Israel! Because God had given the pattern, and because the people had obediently followed, under Moses, every detail, there was harmony of construction, and all of the parts fitted perfectly together. At length the Tabernacle stood complete in all its beauty, and God had but to enter in. Moses stood at the door, and Aaron, arrayed in his golden clothes after the pattern God had given, and the sons of Aaron in white garments, stood at the door of the tent to represent the people, while the people stood at the doors of their tents, which were stationed in order in a great square about the tent, the Levites being located opposite the front. And while they waited, God came down into the tent and filled it with his shining presence as a cloud all illuminated.

Gospel Foreshadowed

It is too much forgotten that God gave at Sinai not only the law, but the Gospel—the law carved in stone, the Gospel pictured in the gold and blue and scarlet of the Tabernacle. It was a kindergarten gospel, expressed in colors and motions for a newly emancipated race of slaves, who were appropriately called "the children of Israel," for they were indeed grown-up children. They needed to be taught as children are taught to-day, in kindergartens and in the best homes, where unseen things are likened to things seen, and the unknown is reached through the known. Only ten months had the Israelites been freedmen, and few of them could probably have read words, and fewer still could have thought out a theology. But they were able to receive at least some dim ideas of religion by the help of symbols. The interpretation of the Tabernacle is not left to our human fancy. As one goes through an art gallery confidently if he has the official catalogue in hand, so we have no room to doubt what the Tabernacle means, for we have an inspired guide-book in the Epistle to the Hebrews and other Scriptures. The Tabernacle and all its parts, its furniture and priesthood and sacrifices, point to the work of Christ, both objective and subjective, his work for us and in us. He is at once the true Tabernacle, the High Priest and the Sacrifice.

The Tabernacle, as a whole, pictures the incarnation, the coming of Christ to be a man with men, as the first chapter of John's Gospel reminds us: "The Word was made flesh, and tented among us." Look down from Sinai's cliffs upon the almost numberless tents of Israel, and there in the centre is a separate tent, larger, and yet small, whose exterior appearance is similar to the others, and which represents Christ made like unto his brethren in his real humanity.

The Symbols Prescribed

The golden and beautiful interior of the tent symbolizes the divinity hidden in Christ's humanity, which was revealed on the Mount of Transfiguration, when John and others beheld his glory. The only visible sign of divineness in the exterior view of the Tabernacle, save glimpses perhaps of the golden walls under its three covers, was the pillar of fire and cloud that hovered above it.

A church building is but the Tabernacle turned to boards or bricks, and should still picture Christ among men, as it stands in the midst of the homes of the congregation. Alas! that any should let his affection stop at the church, which is but the guide board, pointing to fellowship with Christ. As well might one eat the invitation to a dinner instead of enjoying the fellowship to which it invites.

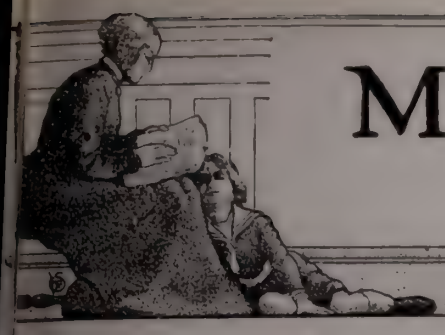
Entering the Tabernacle court, the first thing seen is the brazen altar, which pictures the cross. Beside the altar stands the high priest at certain times, in spotless robes of white, and offers an animal, whole and perfect, which is subsequently slain; all of which pictures Christ as our sinless Mediator, offering himself

A Perfect Sacrifice

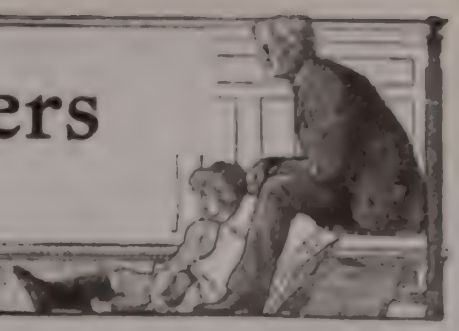
The high priest was required first to offer for himself, and then continually for the people; but Christ, our high priest, needs no atonement for himself, and is so perfect as to make priesthood and sacrifices forever unnecessary after he said, "It is finished." The Tabernacle altar, ever gory with the blood of offerings, proclaimed impressively to the children of Israel: (1) that sin is "exceedingly sinful"; (2) that "the wages of sin is death"; (3) that God provides a substitute. The altar, as a part of the life of Christ in us, stands for the spirit of self-sacrifice, which displaces selfishness when the mind of Christ is imparted.

The Most Holy Place from which in the picture the column of smoke rises, the Bible tells us stands for a symbol of heaven itself, into which, through the rent veil of his crucified flesh, Christ has entered for us as our Advocate and Intercessor, asking pardon for us through his own blood, sprinkled on the mercy-seat, the beaten gold cover of the Ark of the Covenant, which pictured the very throne of God in the law, and yet it is the place of mercy.

*International Sunday School Lesson for August 4, 1907. The Tabernacle. Ex. 40: 1-15, 34-38. Golden Text. "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." Ex. 40: 34.



Men as Home-Makers



By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

WE are in the habit of thinking of men as the supporters and providers of the home, while we give the honorable title of home-makers to women. In other words, we consider the wife and mother as the guardian spirit of the household, and we are usually impressed with a sense of her responsibility for its welfare and happiness. Is the wife a good manager? Does she make the most of the means at her command? Is she good-tempered, brave and cheery? Does she set an example of sweetness and self-control to her children? Is she contented to reign at home? These and other questions present themselves to our minds when the subject of home is under discussion. Undoubtedly, a woman's faith and courage, a woman's good housekeeping, a woman's unmeasured devotion have a strong and vital influence in the upbringing of her children and the gradual development of her husband's character. But, though we attribute a large measure of influence to women, men in their homes cannot escape or evade their individual share.

The recent correspondence received by the editor of this page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has convinced her that husbands and fathers are not given full credit by the public for what they do in promoting the true interests of the home. Men have written with the utmost candor and freedom and with a surpassing honesty on the topic of large or small families, their opinions being as widely different as the North and the South Pole. Judging by the letters sent the editor on this theme alone there are men without chivalry, without delicacy of feeling and with strangely medieval notions, who boldly affirm that a wife has no claim to consideration in the matter of the size of her family. Her part, they think, is epitomized in Jean Ingelow's lines:

> To bear, to nurse, to rear,
> To love, and then to lose.

If a woman have the exceptional vigor and elasticity, as well as the comfortable environment, in which she can become the mother of many children, with short intervals between their production, no one has the least right to complain. The question is for the determination of herself and her husband. But God never meant that a woman reluctantly bearing a large family, should drop and die of exhaustion in her early middle age. The men who hold this view do not remain widowers very long.

In fine contrast to these correspondents are others as tender, knightly and gentle as ever was Arthur of the Table Round. They have the most delicate appreciation of woman's nature, and the most sacredly kept regard for woman in wifehood and motherhood. Curiously, as yet men only have cared to discuss this especial theme in this connection.

On the other theme of housekeeping on an economic basis men also write with great frankness and are very ready to relate their experience. As in a majority of instances husbands control the pocketbook and wives have little to say in reference to the expenditure of money, it is natural that we should hear their masculine comments and convictions on the point of careful family living. In justice to men it must be observed that they are neither misers nor spendthrifts, and that they are willing to share whatever self-denial is necessary for the saving of money and the avoidance of debt. In their letters, too, there is a difference, for all men do not equally comprehend what may be called the burden of domesticity. Unless a man has ever personally done housework he knows nothing of its wear and tear. In no circumstances can he know much about it.

As home-makers, what is demanded of husbands and fathers? First, is it too much to ask that they shall not be grumpy and morose, and that they shall fight strenuously against the common tendency of their sex—to veto a proposition before an argument, and to spread a wet blanket over impulsive enthusiasm?

Next, should they not refuse to be called indulgent by way of compliment and insist on being styled just and magnanimous? Next, again, ought they not to do what they can to entertain and divert their wives when affairs have been monotonous, to halve their labors and to cheer them with the golden sunlight of devoted love? The husband who is his wife's sweetheart, the father who is his children's ideal defender and pattern, is the finest home-maker in the land. A pleasant bit of household life finds revelation in one of the letters recently sent to this page:

> Apropos of your call in the HERALD of June 5, I will give you a page of my experience in the matrimonial and home-building line. Possibly you will not care to listen to a story from me, as I don't belong to that class of men on salary or working for wages. I live in the Ozark Mountains of Missouri, where land has always been cheap. On my twenty-first birthday I filed a homestead claim on 160 acres of land. I "kept bach" till I proved my claim and received my patent. In the spring of 1901, just after I was thirty, I married. That year with us was a great drought year, and all I had was seventy-one bushels of wheat and a moderate supply of fruit for myself and wife to live on for the ensuing year. It was surprising what that seventy-one bushels of wheat accomplished. It reminded us greatly of the widow's cruse.
> We found out in that first year that happiness doesn't necessarily consist of an abundance of the material things of this world. Our living was mostly bread, butter and fruit received in a spirit of thankfulness at first hand from God. Probably my cash income at present does not exceed $100 a year. We have four children, and my wife's father is living with us, making seven in all. This is the ideal life when ideally lived. The size of the family is of but little moment in the expense account when we get our needs supplied almost as direct from the hand of God as did the Israelites of old in the wilderness. I find that our children at their tender age are eager to do many things that eventually work out contributory to their own support, and while giving them the needed physical exercise, it is to them but recreation. As to the expenses you mention as "personal indulgences of the young husband," all those mentioned have never had any place in my life, and we are making it a strict rule to subscribe for only those papers that have a decided tendency to be elevating and educative. When I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD about that pitiful little ten days' outing of Miss Lucy of Texas, [illegible] of the city that have been robbed of their vacations, I used to think God that I have the blessed privilege to be the parent of children that have a better environment for all the days of their finest Mont Lawn to be imagined growing up in the loving care of their natural guardians in the country. Explained in a letter, this is a cheap country. I have no rent to pay. Fuel may be had in abundance for the cutting. I have a good garden that beats a green grocery all to pieces, for I can I buy without money and but little labor a bountiful supply of potatoes, cabbages, etc., together with several vineyards of berries, grapes etc., ad infinitum. So the most of my income is received [illegible] in the things consumed.

THE DAUGHTERS OF THE DESERT—AN ALGERIAN STUDY

Could we read the story behind the faces,
We should find their secrets were much like ours;

And these fair women in desert places,
Like us, have share both in thorns and flowers.

This letter is appropriately followed by another, telling of love, intelligence and economy:

> At the age of seven years I was left to make my own way in life. I did not marry till I was thirty-five; that gave me a chance to save for a home. Now I have been married twenty-seven years, paid $2,400 for our home, $1,000 in bank, fourteen payments made on a $2,000 endowment policy in the Travelers' Insurance Company. Have three children, all boys, insured in the Prudential for 10 cents each a week. We buy our sugar by the hundred-weight, saving on that amount from forty-five to sixty per cent.; then we buy flour by the barrel; coal is always ordered in April, the cheapest time of the year. Our taxes are always paid early and the percentage taken off.
> My wife and I get along very nicely and I am among those who say that marriage is not a failure. We always talk over our plans and compare our ideas, then we agree and go ahead.
>
> I don't smoke cigars or use tobacco in any way, not even to keep the moths out of my overcoat in the summertime.
>
> When we were married my income was only $480 a year. Now it is $900. We pay all our bills promptly. Our church pledge is $40 a year, and we never refuse to pay extras as they come along.

Much Depends on the Wife

I have lived on less than $500 a year in a city. We rented a small house on the edge of town for $6 a month or $72 a year. It cost us on an average $5 a month for fuel or $60 a year. I fed myself and husband on an average of $15 a month, but we had a tiny backyard where we raised a few fresh vegetables.

Very much depends on the wife. If she is a good cook and allows no scraps of food to go to waste, if her bread is always sweet and light and her cake never falls, it helps a great deal in the year's expense. She should realize that the cheaper cuts of meat are fully as satisfactory when well cooked as the most expensive ones. Plain, wholesome food, well cooked, is much better for a family than the most expensive food poorly cooked. We used very little meat of any kind and plenty of fruit and vegetables and cereals. Then if the wife is handy and neat about sewing so that she can make all her own clothes, except the "best dress," that helps a lot. If the couple can contrive to pay for their housekeeping outfit so as to start in free from debt, they ought to save a little every year out of $500, and if the rent can be applied on paying for a house of their own, they can soon own their own home. The husband should help by leaving off the tobacco habit if he has it, as that will cost more in a year than the flour will. If the husband and wife agree together to live simply and put aside unnecessary pleasure and work together with the object of living within their income, there is no reason why they should not marry on $500 a year.

M. A. L.

A Suggestive Letter

We have been married five years. Our income and outgo have been about $2,500 a year, but since we have had to provide not only for ourselves, but also for an average of about five children all this time, we think we have a right to enter the class of young couples who, with only themselves and perhaps one or two others to provide for, must keep their expenses down to $500.

Perhaps some of the lessons we have learned will be helpful to others. Our first and best lesson is this—not to let our living get us into debt—under no circumstances to buy anything that we have not the money on hand to pay for. When you must economize, you will be surprised to find in how many unthought of ways you can do it.

We can bring these periods of enforced economy upon ourselves by laying aside a part of our income and then resolutely holding to the determination to get through on what is left. Far better to have $500 and know that you could through on $50 less if necessary, than to have $2,000 and not know how to meet every emergency that may arise.

Very much depends upon the selection of articles of food. We must know how to get the largest amount of wholesome nourishment for the least money. Then, too, the art of buying must be cultivated. Many things that are commonly regarded as essentials are not really essential, and may not be best for us even if we could afford them.

GABRIELLE

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

By Isabella MacFarlane

N the morning two hooded friars made their appearance, and from that time on, systematic efforts, seconded by various kinds of torres on the part of the soldiers, were de to convert the household to the atholic, Apostolic and Roman" faith. The story of the Revocation has been itten out in all its hideous details in histories of the times. The sufferrs of the Bonnefoy family were simi- to those of thousands of others.

But David de Bonnefoy, as has been d, was a man of means. While he fed d housed the dragoons, and endured enormities committed by them as tiently as he could, he was laying his ans for leaving the country. To this d he was quietly turning all his propty—or as much of it as could be saved om the rapacity and wanton waste of e soldiery—into portable form, that might have the means to support his mily in another land.

Captain Girard, the young dragoon ficer, had been several times to the use, ostensibly to look after his men, t really, as Bonnefoy believed, in the pe of seeing Gabrielle.

But Gabrielle was not there.

Among the birthday guests there had en a Madame Pauline Bertrand, mother f the pretty Rosalie who had coveted e hand of Raoul for the fête. She as a widow, and lived in a small inland wn about twenty miles from La Rochelle, where, the inhabitants being mostly atholics, there was no jarring of opinns or faiths, and no need for dragoons. adame Bertrand was herself a Catholic, but perfectly friendly to the Huguenot part of the family.

In her care, David believed his daughter would be safe; and on the morning fter the arrival of the soldiers he proosed that Gabrielle should go home with er and her daughter.

"O father!" said the girl, "do not send e away. I cannot be spared. Who ill care for my mother and grandother, and the two girls, Jeanne and arie? I cannot go away and leave hem."

"They will be taken care of. Old hristine will attend to them. I shall ire a man to cook and care for the oldiers. We shall do very well, and I hall be much happier to know that my ear Gabrielle is in a place of safety, way from all contact with these brutalzed men." Then Gabrielle consented, nd on the morrow left La Rochelle in ompany with Cousin Pauline and her laughter.

CHAPTER IV

The Old Mendicant

ONE evening, several weeks after the advent of the dragoons, Louis Marquand was sitting alone in the house where he and his father had dwelt together for many years. That father was now in exile, having been compelled, as we have seen, to flee at short notice, and forbidden to take his family or any of his belongings with him. His object had been, as David said, to escape to England in one of the vessels that frequently entered the port of La Rochelle; but so closely were the exiles watched, that this was a difficult thing to do; and to be found in France after the time, meant death or the galleys.

His mother being dead, Louis' relations with his father had been peculiarly close and tender. He had studied with him, and expected to follow him in his profession. But now his career was closed, and he only waited to hear some word from his father, in order to follow him into exile.

Louis had not heard a word from him since he left, and was worried and anxious in consequence.

It was a stormy night. The wind blew fiercely. The rain poured in torrents.

"My poor father!" said Louis to himself. "I wonder if he is out in this storm, wandering homeless, or if he has found a shelter in England or the Netherlands."

Then his mind reverted to the scene at David de Bonnefoy's, and from that his thoughts naturally passed to Gabrielle, between whom and himself there was a strong and long-standing attachment. No nuptial rites could at the present time crown their love, for all Huguenot marriages had been declared null and void.

"Opening the door he beheld three dragoons——"

While he grieved over her absence, he could not but approve of her father's course in sending her away from the city and the horrors of the dragonnade.

"But what is to come of all this? When will this time of struggle and anguish be over?"

His meditations were interrupted by a loud rapping on the street door, as if some one had struck it with a stick.

"Oh, what is this?" cried he. "Have the dragoons come to me also?"

The blows on the door were repeated.

Louis opened it, and there in the raging storm stood a poor old beggar-man, his clothes hanging in tatters, his gray hair dripping with wet, and a rough stick in his hand.

"For the love of God let me in, and give me a mouthful of food!" he gasped.

Louis stepped back to let him in, and almost dropped the candle he held in his hand when he saw who it was.

"My father!" Setting down the candle on the floor, he opened his arms, and drew the old man to his breast, all dripping as he was, and both men sobbed in irrepressible emotion.

Then Louis seated his father in an old leather-cushioned chair, and ran for some bread, which the old man devoured like one famishing, as indeed he was.

"Oh, my boy! my boy!" he said. "I have not tasted food for three days. For though I went from door to door as a beggar, people were afraid to give me anything, lest they should bring trouble to themselves."

"But why come back here, dear father? It is the most dangerous place for you. The dragoons are here. They have taken possession at neighbor Bonnefoy's, and—only think—have stabled their horses in the dear old temple, pulling down the pulpit, and smashing the seats, or making racks of them to feed their horses from."

"Where could I go? Having failed to reach the ship on which I had hoped to sail, I sought refuge in the woods and swamps, feeding on nuts and wild berries, with now and then a few grains of wheat which I gleaned from the fields and rubbed out with my hands. Sleeping in caves, hunted like a wild beast, hooted and often chased with clubs and pitchforks by the peasants—where could I go? What could I do, but come home to die?"

"Perhaps," said Louis, thoughtfully, as he busied himself in removing the drenched and tattered garments from his father's emaciated frame, substituting clean, dry ones for them, "perhaps, as I am alone in the house, and no one has seen you come in—thanks to the night and the storm—I may be able to conceal you for a time. I shall make up a bed for you in the attic, where you must be content to remain without a light save what comes through the one dormer pane; for a light might betray you. And especially you must refrain from singing Clement Marot's Psalms of David in which you used to take so much delight—for that is forbidden, and would surely betray you."

"Yes," said his father, "I hardly dared to sing them in the mountain cave that sheltered me, lest the sound should be heard by some casual passer-by. Ah, my son, what scenes I have witnessed since I went away! I have seen noblemen trundling wheel-barrows, driving pigs, leading donkeys loaded with vegetables—I have seen preachers rigged out like sportsmen with dog and gun—ladies, accustomed to the wearing of satin shoes, with clumsy sabots [wooden shoes] on their feet like peasant women—all being in order to disguise themselves that they might reach the frontiers or the ports, and escape. It is an evil day for France—an evil day indeed. For the very best of her people, the bone and sinew of the land, are leaving her."

"Dear father, you are weary. You need repose. And I am every moment in dread that the soldiers may come and find you here. Come! let us hasten to the attic, where I think you will be safe."

Father and son crept up the steep staircase, the one supporting the feeble steps of the other.

Gathering together some old blankets, cast-off clothing, and other articles such as are apt to accumulate in garrets, and bringing some pillows from his own room, Louis soon had a comfortable makeshift couch for his father, and the exhausted old man, after a fervent prayer to God, lay down on it, and almost as soon as he touched the pillow, fell asleep.

Louis then went down stairs, and sat down once more to ponder the situation, which had become more complicated than ever. What to do with his father was the problem. The dragoons were everywhere. The city was full of them. One so well known as a popular preacher of "the Religion" would quickly be recognized. At last he made up his mind to arise at peep of day, hurry to the harbor, and engage a passage for him on an English vessel which lay anchored in the roadstead, awaiting a cargo of just such contraband "freight," and then contrive some way to smuggle his father aboard.

Having come to this conclusion, he began to prepare for bed. Taking off his coat, he hung it on a peg in a rack where several other garments were hanging.

The storm was now over, and the night well advanced.

On a sudden, he heard heavy footsteps at the door, followed by a loud authoritative knocking.

Louis reached for his coat, but by mistake laid hold of an old clerical gown of his father's, which he threw over his shoulders.

Opening the door, he beheld three dismounted dragoons, evidently half drunk.

Questions and Answers

L. J., Dansville, N. Y. Who was the inventor of spectacles?

They are believed to have been unknown to the ancients, although the Emperor Nero had a smaragdus, which he used as an eyeglass, but it was neither concave nor magnifying. Archimedes is said to have used magnifying glasses to set fire to the enemy's ships (212 B.C.). Roger Bacon, of England (who was known as "Doctor Mirabilis"), is believed to have been the first person to advocate the use of magnifying glasses "to make old people see better." The actual discoverer of spectacles was Salvino degli Armati, a Florentine, who died in 1317.

E. D. J., Franklin, Pa. Can you tell me in what year the Roman Catholic Church was organized and in what place?

Church historians generally agree that it grew out of the primitive Christian Church. The "Old Catholic Church," which took form in the second century, was its immediate predecessor. In the eighth century, the growing temporal power of Rome afforded the opportunity gradually to change the episcopate into a papal church, but it was not until the pontificate of Gregory VII. (in 1073), that the system was completed and the Roman Catholic Church took on its characteristic features.

F. H. L., Narragansett Pier, R. I. Will THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tell an interested subscriber what practical work has been done by the U. S. Volunteer Life-Saving Corps? What is the extent of its service and under what form of government is it carried on?

It is organized and incorporated in all the States. Its New York State work alone, with which we are most familiar, covers the important points of all the lakes and rivers in the State, from Montauk Point, L.I., to the shores of Lakes Erie and Ontario. It has 1,900 stations and 22,000 members, all expert swimmers, yachtsmen and boatmen, with about 6,000 boats. It has saved 6,557 lives in 12 years and has awarded 1,705 honor medals for heroic rescues.

Rev. R. S. Schoonmaker, founder of the Glen Alpine Springs School, western North Carolina, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD calling for the services of a volunteer teacher:

"Consecrated, and who understands teaching, and is willing and able to give, merely for traveling and living expenses, services in the endeavor to educate the white children of our Southern Highlands. We need the services of an intermediate teacher. Will pay car-fare east of the Mississippi, and living expenses."

Rev. Mr. Schoonmaker's present address is Plainfield, N. J.

Mrs. H. C., The Dalles, Ore. What are meteors, and how are they formed, and why do they explode?

Meteors are divided into three classes: Stone meteorites, iron meteorites and shooting stars. The two former are found in almost all countries, but, except those which have been seen to fall, nothing is known as to when they fell. Only in eight or ten instances have they been seen to fall to the earth, though they are seen much oftener to pass rapidly through the sky, with intense brilliancy, caused by friction with the atmosphere. Where they came from is unknown. They have been analyzed, and though many of the substances are familiar here, no new one has yet been found. The irons contain about ten per cent. of nickel, copper and tin are found, but no silver or gold. Some resemblance between them and volcanic iron has induced many to conclude that they were thrown up into the sky at least seventy miles. The theory is weak. The origin of the third variety of meteors, called shooting stars, is supposed to be attenuated comet tails. They are very small. Not one has ever reached the earth, they being instantly consumed in the upper atmosphere. They often fall in showers. The first recorded in modern times took place on November 12, 1799, and has been repeated three times since, namely, on November 13, 1833; November 14, 1866, and November 15, 1899; it will be repeated November 16, 1933. That of 1833 surpassed by far all others. I saw it in all its glory, which no words can describe. They fell like snowflakes in a moderate snow-storm. It is supposed that some time in the far past an immense comet appeared, throwing off a left-behind tail many hundred millions of miles in length, which repeated its coming till it had formed an entire ring, through which the earth passes every year, producing a slight display but once in thirty-three years. To explain the origin of shooting stars, we must explain the origin of comets, which no one can do. Shooting stars are brighter and far more numerous in the morning than in the evening sky, for the reason that in the morning the earth's motion is toward them, but in the evening from them.

Marathon, N. Y. LEWIS SWIFT.

Mrs. J. McG., New Boston, N. H. Which is the oldest Protestant Church?

Those who left the Catholic Church at the time of the Reformation were called Lutherans, Zwinglians, Anabaptists, etc., but were designated by no general name. They received their collective name in 1529, at the second Diet of Spires, and were thereafter known as "Protestants." From these contemporaneously sprang up the Lutherans, the Reformed Churches of Germany, Switzerland, France and Holland, the Presbyterians (followers of Calvin), the Arminians, etc.

A. E. A., Stanwood, Ont. Would the Chautauqua Summer Assembly help me in my work of village school teacher?

It would help anybody in any work. The schools offer extensive courses in college and normal studies, together with music, arts and crafts, expression and business training, with instructors from Yale, Cornell, Princeton and other high-grade educational institutions.

F. B. H., Memphis, Tenn. Among the great changes which are taking place in Japan, does the court regime still permit concubinage?

In order to secure the succession by heirs, concubinage has been the custom of the Japanese Court in the past. This custom ends with the present reign, by desire of the Crown Prince. His wife, the Crown Princess Sada, is the sole mistress of a blameless home.

Several Readers. The Pickaninny Band, whose musical performances delighted our visitors at Mont-Lawn on July 4, is from Charleston, S. C. The band was organized by Rev. D. J. Jenkins, founder of the Jenkins Orphanage in that city, and of the Reformatory Farm, which was destroyed by fire some time ago. The Pickaninnies are giving concerts in the effort to raise money to rebuild the reformatory. Mr. Jenkins' address is 20 Franklin Street, Charleston, S. C.

H. B., St. Albans, Vt. 1. To what denomination do Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts belong? 2. When did the present Emperor of Germany marry and what is her name? 3. Has Queen Wilhelmina any children? 4. What is the relation of the present Czar to Grand Duke Michael?

1. Dr. Crafts and his wife are Methodists. 2. The German Emperor married the Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-Augustenburg. 3. No. 4. He is the youngest brother of Nicholas II. of Russia.

E. R. J., Minneapolis, Minn. What results have been reported from the Babylonian expedition recently sent out by the University of Chicago?

Perhaps no other such important "find" has yet been unearthed by the expedition as that at Bismya, where an old dump heap has been discovered by the side of the ruins of an ancient temple upon which the temple priests of 6,400 years ago discarded the broken utensils used in their worship; now these fragments of alabaster, onyx and marble, engraved and inlaid with ivory, are art treasures of great value. Vase inscriptions of 4,500 B.C. have been found, and still little below the surface of the mound or "dump" has been touched.

Mrs. A. V., Davenport, Ia. 1. Why is an earnest prayer for a good cause unanswered? 2. Does THE CHRISTIAN HERALD belong to any special church denomination?

1. Human judgment, as to the merits of any cause, or the desirability of any particular object upon which our hearts are set, is apt to err. What you have asked might possibly prove more of an evil than a blessing, if it were granted. 2. No; it is interdenominational.

Lizzie J. S., Sigma, Va. 1. The negro race is believed to be descended from Ham, one of the sons of Noah. 2. There has been much profitless speculation as to the "mark" that was set upon Cain (Gen. 4: 15). The original text, however, says nothing of a "mark." The original words are: "The Lord gave a sign [or token or pledge] to Cain that no one who found him should kill him." The nature of the sign is unknown. It may have been a charge to Adam and all his family to offer no violence to Cain. Whatever its nature, it was reassuring and sufficient.

The revival hymn, "Get Right with God," is steadily growing in popularity and is sung at Gospel meetings in many places, the simplicity of the melody making it a prime favorite with audiences generally. It may be procured in leaflet form from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, mailed at ten cents per hundred copies.

The McKinley Memorial

THE McKinley National Memorial at Canton, O., is approaching completion. The monument is nearly 100 feet high, and 79 feet in diameter. Four approaches lead up to it, the front approach being 58 feet wide, with 98 steps from the plaza below up to the circular platform surrounding the mausoleum. The architect is H. Van Buren Magonigle of New York City. The exterior is of granite from Milford, Mass. The memorial is to be dedicated September 30 next. The photograph is furnished to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through the courtesy of Mr. O. F. Johnson of Canton.

"Aha!" cried one of them, seizing Louis by the arm, apparently mistaking him for his father; "have we caught you, dog of a heretic? We heard you will been seen by the flash of a light from the door, to enter here in the disguise of an old beggar, by which you will tried to deceive the king's loyal subjects—and yonder, by my soul! lie the rags on the floor! Oh, boys," turning to his companions, "are we not in luck? Ten pistoles apiece shall we get for this capture, besides furnishing the king's navy with another galley slave!"

Louis had been on the point of shaking the fellow off and undeceiving him. But at these words he paused. A galley slave? His father a galley slave? That poor, feeble old man chained to the terrible rowing-bench? Starved, beaten, scourged with knives, lashed with whips? A cold sweat broke out on Louis' forehead. He trembled in every limb. But he held his peace.

"But that's not all," continued the fellow, swaying from side to side on his wavering legs, but retaining his grip on Louis' arm. "There's a chain-gang being made up. It is to start to-morrow morning for Marseilles—one hundred and fifty accursed heretics in the chain—and this fellow—haw! haw! will come in just right to make Number One of the next fifty!"

Louis had more than once witnessed the horrors of the chain gang—the iron collar, weighing thirty pounds, riveted around the neck, the chain riveted to it, and connecting with another heavier chain that linked the whole gang together, so that if one of the unfortunates fell in his tracks and died, the whole gang was temporarily delayed, the drivers on horseback swinging their long-lashed whips. He hesitated no longer.

Lifting up his heart in a fervent though unspoken prayer for strength to do what seemed so plainly set before him, he held out his wrist to the soldier, who quickly snapped the handcuff upon it. Then dragging the fellow with him, he drew near a table on which lay some books and writing materials, and with his free hand wrote on the fly-leaf of a psalm-book:

"Adieu, my father! Adieu, Gabrielle! I go to the galleys. LOUIS."

CHAPTER V

A FATHER'S SORROW

THE sun was high in the heavens when, the next morning, Pastor Marquand awoke from the deep sleep of exhaustion into which he had fallen the night before. Not a sound had he heard. Not even a dream had disturbed his heavy slumbers.

The first thing that struck him when he woke was the utter stillness of the house.

"Louis must have gone out," thought he, "or perhaps he is in the kitchen, preparing breakfast. Yet no—it is so late, he must have breakfasted alone, long since." Then he called, softly, lest he should be overheard by some one: "Louis!"—and then a little louder: "Louis! where are you?"

Receiving no answer, he dressed himself in trembling haste, and descended the narrow stair.

He passed from room to room, seeking his son; but no Louis was there; there was no fire on the hearth, no signs of preparation for a meal. He found on the floor of the entry the marks of muddy boots, and in the same place observed a sickening odor, compounded of the smell of dirty clothes and the fumes of liquor from tainted breaths, which had been imprisoned there by the shutting of the door.

Passing thence into his son's sleeping-room, he found the same silence and emptiness. The bed had evidently not been used.

Hanging conspicuously on a peg, he observed his son's coat.

"What is the meaning of this?" said he to himself. "He cannot have gone far without his coat."

He then sought the principal room of the house, in which they had sat the previous evening. Here also all seemed undisturbed. Glancing around, he observed that a book lay open on the table. It was his favorite psalm-book. He took it up, and read the fatal words traced by Louis: "Adieu, my father! Adieu, Gabrielle! I go to the galleys!"

The book fell from the old man's hands. He staggered, and would have fallen, had he not caught the edge of the table.

"My son! my Louis! Gone to the galleys!"

Overwhelmed with grief, crushed as he had never been by his own sufferings, the broken-hearted father sank on a chair, and laying his gray head on his arms as they rested on the table, gave vent to his sorrow in sighs and groans and tears and ejaculatory prayers, and sobbings that convulsed his aged frame.

After a time, becoming calmer (for he knew where to look for consolation), he felt the necessity of finding someone to share his trouble. He resolved, notwithstanding the danger, to go to his friend and former parishioner, David de Bonnefoy.

Gathering up his tattered garments from the floor, he put them on, and taking his staff and wallet, started for his old friend's house by by-ways and narrow lanes in order to escape observation. To approach the front of the house was out of the question. A guard of soldiers stood by the gate. Others loitered in the courtyard.

Stealing round by the back of the house, the seeming mendicant made his way to a side door, and knocked, but not with his staff, lest the dragoons should hear.

The door was opened by de Bonnefoy himself, who, seeing the pitiable object, put his hand in his pocket as if to give a gratuity; but the next moment, recognizing his old pastor, he placed his finger on his lip in token of silence, and motioned him to follow into the house.

"Dear pastor," he said, as soon as they reached a private room, "what means this? Why have you come back?"

It need hardly be said that the sturdy faith of the Bonnefoys had withstood all the ferocious attempts of the dragoons, and all the wily arts of the Jesuits, to "convert" them. But their very steadfastness had served to prolong the persecution, and delay the removal of the soldiers from the house.

In a broken voice the old pastor told of his wanderings, his return, and the terrible fate that had befallen his son, which was all the more terrible that it was to them so unaccountable.

"Louis had done nothing," said David, "to provoke such a fate, and it is strange that he should have gone without his coat, for the night was cold and stormy. Was there perhaps some other coat that he might have worn?"

"No. There was none. Nothing but an old preaching coat of mine that hung an a peg—and now I think of it, I did not see it there this morning. Perhaps—"

"Ah, that is it," said de Bonnefoy, with sudden enlightenment. "He has worn your garment. The brave boy has personated you and gone to the galleys in your place. God bless him!"

"Alas! if it be so, he has sacrificed his young life to save the mere remnant of mine."

"Perhaps God has so ordered it, because he yet has work for you to do. I and a few of my fellow-citizens, merchants, artisans, skilled workmen in various trades, have chartered an English vessel, in which, with our families and as much of our worldly goods as we can save from the rapacity of the dragoons, we intend to escape to England. There some of our company will stay and establish the industries in which they have been engaged here, but I and my family shall take ship from thence to North America, where my kinsman Roger has found a home, and you, dear pastor, shall go with us, and be our pastor in another land. Some have already gone on board the ship, which lies at anchor outside the dyke, or cruises off and on along the coast."

"Do with me what you will. My heart is broken by the evil I have brought on my son."

"In the meantime, you cannot remain here, dear friend. You would surely be discovered. You must go back to your attic and lie close until the time of sailing, and I or Raoul will see that you get food every day."

"How does Madame de Bonnefoy, with her delicate health, stand the strain of these terrible times?"

"With patience and resignation, like the brave sweet woman she is," said the husband of the "brave sweet woman." "And my dear old mother is the comforter of us all—telling us tales of her girlhood in the old siege of La Rochelle, under Richelieu, when the suffering was ten times greater than it is now."

"And Gabrielle—my sweet Gabrielle, whom I had hoped to call daughter?" said the pastor, with faltering voice.

"Gabrielle is not here. She is with my cousin Pauline Bertrand, at her home, and that is where I must go, this very day, to convey to her the sad intelligence of what has befallen her lover. Do not weep, dear friend. It is rare, it is true, for any one to escape from the galleys, but yet it might happen. Let us have hope, therefore, dear pastor, and trust in the goodness of God."

After partaking of a comfortable meal, the "mendicant," pulling his tattered cap well down over his brows, and resuming his staff and wallet, stole out into the streets again, and fortunately encountering none of the soldiers, reached his place of concealment in safety.

India Orphans Help China

THIS letter from a missionary in India beautifully illustrates the work of Christian love and sympathy in the human heart. These children of India mentioned in the letter, having known what famine means, are ready to help others who suffer:

SAHARANPUR, N. P., India, June 18.

By last week's mail we sent you a money order for 124 rupees 8 annas for the China Famine Fund. This money is sent by the boys in our Industrial School and Orphanage, with the exception of a few rupees given by teachers and others. After service Sunday morning, Mr. Borup told the boys in a few words about the suffering in China, and then left the plea for help with them. Many of our boys know what it means to pass through a famine, and it did our hearts good to see them respond so nobly to the plea.

We had not reached our house after the service was over before one boy handed me the first anna, and then they kept us busy during the afternoon bringing their annas and pice. We were touched to see the way they gave. One little fellow, who had only come to us a few days before, brought his one pice, all he had. One boy gave one rupee and eight annas—a big sum for a poor boy; it had taken a long time to save it. Another gave eight annas, and so on. One boy brought one anna and three pice in the morning. God worked in his heart and in the evening he brought twelve annas more and we then knew he had given all he had.

After Sunday School, the boys had a meeting in the prayer-hall, all by themselves, after which they came to us and told us what they had planned to do, and our hearts rejoiced. The boys get meat twice a week, and they like their meat better than anything else. They asked to do without meat for two months; a great sacrifice for these boys. Then work was given them to do, whereby they could earn money in their free time. And thus the money sent you a week ago was subscribed, and we pray it may bring much blessing, both to the receivers and givers.

It is about seven years ago since you visited us in our house in Viramgam, Gujarat, dear Dr. Klopsch. You may have forgotten, but we will never forget either your visit or the noble way you and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD helped us during that awful famine.

MEAT OR CEREALS

A Question of Interest to All Careful Persons

Arguments on food are interesting. Many persons adopt a vegetarian diet on the ground that they do not like to feel that life has been taken to feed them, nor do they fancy the thought of eating dead meat.

On the other hand, too great consumption of partly cooked, starchy oats and wheat or white bread, pastry, etc., produces serious bowel troubles, because the bowel digestive organs, (where starch is digested), are overtaxed and the food ferments, producing gas, and microbes generate in the decayed food, frequently bringing on peritonitis and appendicitis.

Starchy food is absolutely essential to the human body. Its best form is shown in the food "Grape-Nuts," where the starch is changed into a form of sugar during the process of its manufacture. In this way, the required food is presented to the system in a pre-digested form, and is immediately made into blood and tissue, without taxing the digestive organs.

A remarkable result in nourishment is obtained; the person using Grape-Nuts gains quickly in physical and mental strength. Why in mental? Because the food contains delicate particles of Phosphate of Potash obtained from the grains, and this unites with the albumen of all food and the combination is what nature uses to rebuild worn out cells in the brain. This is a scientific fact that can be easily proven by ten day's use of Grape-Nuts. "There's a Reason." Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

The Christian Endeavor Convention

PESSIMISTS who predicted the early decadence of Christian Endeavor must have been surprised at the enthusiastic gathering at the Twenty-third Convention, held on July 10 at Seattle, Wash. In spite of the vast distance from the scenes of its birth and early history, the Christian Endeavor movement proved its strength and energy in the twenty-sixth year of its career, by attracting from every part of our land and from beyond the sea great crowds of devoted adherents, eager to testify to its value and usefulness in their neighborhoods. The generation that entered its membership in their youth, at its inception, have grown to maturity, and a new generation has grown up to join its forces; but the movement has not changed in its principles or purposes, and the Church to-day the world over recognizes the value of the work it has done and is still capable of doing. With its Baptist and Methodist sisters, which are doing a similar work, Christian Endeavor is still caring for the boys and girls at the critical period of their lives when they are most in need of such service and help as these young people's societies can render. Not only ministers and church officers gave testimony to the value of the agency, but the President of the United States, perceiving that good citizenship is based on good character, bore witness to the benefits Christian Endeavor is laboring to achieve. The following letter from Mr. Roosevelt was read at the first session of the Convention:

MY DEAR MR. SHAW:

I thank you for your letter. Through you I wish to extend to the International Christian Endeavor my heartiest good wishes for the admirable work they are doing. Let me in particular express my earnest hope that you will emphasize as one of the features of your Convention the need that the Endeavorers should take a first rank in good citizenship. I am glad you are to endeavor to bring this subject so prominently before this meeting.

It will be a pleasure to accept honorary membership in your Christian Endeavor Patriots' League, for I am sure that with the general purposes and efforts of that League I shall have the heartiest sympathy, though of course I could not commit myself in advance to agree with all of their views without knowing them.

I wish you Godspeed in your work, because the Christian Endeavorers are working for the things that are vital to the soul, and I believe that they can do much that is of the very greatest value to the cause of good citizenship; for in the last analysis the fundamental requisite of good citizenship from the standpoint of the country is that a man should have the very qualities which make him of real value in the home, in the church, and in all the higher relationships of life.

White House, Washington, D.C. Faithfully yours, THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The report of the past two years' progress was read by the general secretary, Mr. William Shaw (not Mr. Von Ogden Vogt, as erroneously stated in a former notice. Mr. Vogt is ex-secretary). From his statement we learn that the number of societies is now 69,138, a net increase of 2,366 over the figures at the preceding Convention two years ago. The total number of members has reached the enormous figure of 3,456,000. That the material results of the organization have kept pace with the spiritual, is evident from the fact that during the two past years the gifts from the societies to missions and general church work have aggregated $4,378,920. The devotion, too, is personal as well as pecuniary. Unstinted testimony to the fact that Christian Endeavorers are the most earnest and effective helpers to the preacher and evangelist is given by such well-known revivalists as Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. R. A. Torrey, Rev. James A. Francis and Rev. John H. Elliott, whose letters to the Convention were appreciated by all the delegates.

Mr. Shaw was able to report marked progress in the foreign field. The European Christian Endeavor Union has been fully organized, and its president, Rev. John Pollock, was present at the Convention to give full reports of its activities. In South America, also, the movement has taken root and has been nourished by a tour of the father of the organization, Rev. Francis E. Clark, D.D. The project of the International Headquarters Building is now well advanced. Mr. Shaw announced that a fund of fifty thousand dollars is already in hand and there are good prospects of a large increase from this Convention. The report in detail was full of encouragement and grounds for hope of still greater triumphs than those already achieved.

Dr. Clark, fresh from his round-the-world tour, brought news of the progress of the movement abroad, which was very significant. Not only in the planting of new societies in England, Australia, India and other lands under the British flag, but in Europe, Africa and China the principles of Christian Endeavor are taking hold. The Federation of Churches, one of the most momentous events in modern English religious life, is distinctly traceable to Christian Endeavor, which proved to the churches that different denominations could co-operate. In South Africa, Dr. Clark saw Boers and Englishmen, opponents in all else, sitting side by side in amity in their Christian Endeavor societies. Peace, concord, brotherhood, the cardinal principles of the society, are spreading among Christians everywhere, and more surely than by international conferences are making it impossible for political schemers and ambitious rulers to provoke war. Dr. Clark expressed the belief that the unions reaching out from one land to another, grasping hands far away, but brought near by a common faith in Christ and love for brother members, was the most effective of all means for bringing about peace among all nations.

Great Gifts to Foreign Missions

Happy Waifs at Mont-Lawn

Among the lowing of the herds,
The rustling of the trees,
Among the singing of the birds,
The humming of the bees—
Where ill thoughts die and good are born,
Out in the fields with God.

THAT, friends of Mont-Lawn, is where you have sent the street waifs who, three times a week the summer through, flock by ...res to the Bible House, en route for ...nt-Lawn. Scantily clad at best, often ...rally in rags, their wan, pinched faces ... shadowed by a sadness that comes ...m cares that only maturer years should ...ow. It is frequently days before they ...get the gloom which has rested upon ...ery hour of their conscious past, and ...owly, as a flower opens its petals to the ...n, they enter into their kingdom for the ...rst time.

Playing on Hot City Sidewalks

Never during its history have the pat...ons of the Children's Home shown ...reater interest in New York City's wee "waifs and strays" than during this sum...ner of 1907. Never was the expression ...f that interest more urgently needed in ...behalf of the constantly increasing hordes ...f tenement childhood who clamor for ...permission to go to the country.

From a far Canadian village comes a ...ot endowment for the season, freighted ...eavily with the love and sacrifice of its ...girlish donor. She writes:

The $21 which I send herein, has been accumulating piece by piece for some time, and I am very happy that it is now ready for you. I am indeed glad to be in any sense a co-worker. This contribution is the gift of a heart longing to carry sunshine and joy into darkened lives where there is so much of poverty and privation. My sympathy and prayers go out to you in the noble work in which you are engaged.

Nor does our own Empire State forget its moral obligation to the young travelers along a rocky path of life. For two whole years a Sunday School class of little boys in Binghamton have been saving their pennies one by one, in order to send another little boy, whose lines are not cast in such pleasant places as their own, for a vacation of riotous glee in the country. Their teacher writes that when, upon a recent Sabbath, they completed the necessary sum, a group of very bright faces and happy hearts forwarded it promptly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home Department. Those unselfish lads, and many others like them, will be glad to hear the story of the sickly mite of a boy who is trotting through the Mont-Lawn meadows at this moment, because the Sunday School boys in Binghamton loved and pitied him.

A few days ago a shabby, dejected-looking woman made application for one of her two boys to go up to Mont-Lawn. Both would have been cordially welcomed, but the mother depended upon her stronger son, and pleaded only for the younger and more delicate one to be given an outing full of fresh air and sunshine. Wee Gustav looked very pathetic and frail. It was learned that his father, formerly a respectable German immigrant, had become violently insane. Before he was placed in confinement, he wrought great injury to his little son. With the vagaries of a clouded mind, he had believed that all humanity was ill unto death, and that his mission was that of universal healer. His near-at-hand baby son was the first victim, a poisonous ointment which the lunatic concocted and applied becoming absorbed by the child's receptive system and subsequently endangering the little life. There is no doubt that the wholesome regimen of Mont-Lawn, the out-of-door freedom and pure air, will work marvels for tiny Gustav. That is the work of the Binghamton boys' three hundred pennies. Who'll be the next?

With the many closets and chests and attics throughout this big country filled with cast-off and outgrown children's garments, which a few stiches and patches would make useful and attractive; with the Christian Endeavor, Woman's Aid and kindred societies which are flourishing in every town and village, waiting for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to ask them for plain, new garments for the ragged children up at Mont-Lawn, it seems unwise to spend money to buy clothing, money which might otherwise be applied to sending another—and yet another—to the Children's Paradise. But they must be clothed and provided with shoes.

There are many of our readers, with large hearts but small purses, who will enjoy contributing to the cause in this way; and their gifts, like those of money, will be fully appreciated and duly acknowledged in these columns. Money contributions should be sent directly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home Department, Bible House, New York City. Clothing should be sent, express prepaid, to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, Nyack, N Y.

Consecration of the Body*

EARLY writers were disposed to hold the body in contempt. Even the apostle Paul seems to despair of it and to see hope only in the power which should "change our vile bodies." It is true that the phrase is softened in the Revised Version, but only in slight degree, to "the body of our humiliation" (Phil. 3: 21). The early theologians regarded it as a hindrance, a weight, a clog, a burden that must obstruct spiritual growth. It was curious, too, that they did not regard the eternal state as complete until that same body was raised again from the corruption of the grave and became once more a habitation for the glorified spirit. True, they looked forward to the body thus raised being transformed and purified, but still the same body spiritualized. Out of the same idea grew the fastings and the chastisements and the irritating garb of the ancient monks.

Later thought refuses to accept this idea of the body. It is the work of God, its mechanism is beautiful and its capacity extraordinary. Better than despising it was the determination to consecrate it, to use it in the service of God, who designed it. Say what we may to its disparagement, it is necessary to our service on earth and through it alone we can labor for God by voice or pen. We are ungrateful if we hold in contempt the body that is our necessary servant.

The misfortune is that so many persons do not recognize it as a servant. They pamper it and indulge it and yield to its cravings until it becomes a master, whose demands can be resisted only after a struggle. The conscience and the will abdicate their places when this rebellion ensues and it then becomes a question whether the man shall become a slave to his appetites and passions, or whether he shall shake off the dominion and lead a life of purity and holiness. The problem is one that, sooner or later, every man has to face. It is in this struggle that he supremely needs divine help. He may consecrate his body, but the contract is not ratified until God has come to his assistance. The body is so completely a part of the man that he fights at a disadvantage if he depends on his own strength. He has a traitor within, which is not dislodged until Christ occupies the throne.

Desiring Righteousness†

ANY one who conceives of righteousness as a cloak or covering misunderstands the meaning of Scripture. It is contrary to our own conscience to suppose that a being utterly corrupt, vile and sinful can ever be regarded with complacency by Him who is righteousness personified, simply by covering his corruption. We need the covering of Christ's righteousness, and we rejoice that it is promised to us; but it is not to be used to hide the deformity and foulness beneath. It is a vain hope for any man to live in sin, believing that he is hidden under that seamless robe which symbolizes Christ's purity. Not even a human judge will consent to regard any man as innocent who is obviously guilty. How much less will the Judge of all the earth blind himself to the facts?

This view seems at first sight to shut the door of hope against every sinner. Even the purest and the best among us is conscious of transgressions of thought which those not so good transform into word and deed. We stand before God guilty and self-convicted. But when conversion comes to a man, when he ceases to desire sin, to enjoy it and to seek it, though he is unable to transform his life, God accepts the intention when it is sincere for the deed. The man becomes righteous in his mind and heart. He puts himself in the hands of God to be made really righteous; but God, who sees the end from the beginning, recognizes in him the righteousness which will come, and regards him as righteous. It is as if a son, hating his father, persistently opposing him, delighting to vex and outrage him, came to his father and declared a changed purpose. He will not oppose him any longer; he begs his father to forgive the past and treat him as a son. Henceforth the boy may do wrong, but he sorrows over it, not glories in it as before, and he works with his father in the reformation of his character. If he is sincere, his father forgives him and rejoices over the change. He is once more a son. His spirit is right and he earnestly desires to become a good son. In other words, he hungers after goodness or righteousness, and all such are blessed of God.

John Wesley's Well-Ordered Life

IN 1725, says a writer in The Chautauquan, upon his election as Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, Wesley wrote, "Leisure and I have parted company," and forthwith he laid out a scheme of study the mere perusal of which causes mental fatigue: Mondays and Tuesdays he devoted to Greek and Latin; Wednesdays to logic and ethics; Thursdays to Hebrew and Arabic; Fridays to metaphysics and natural philosophy; Saturdays to oratory and poetry; Sundays to divinity.

Soon he "resolved to have only such acquaintances as would help him on the way to heaven," and cut himself loose from casual social intercourse at Oxford, and this, too, notwithstanding that he was a charming talker and much liked. He merely had no time for frivolities. A few years later, together with his brother Charles and a few others, he formed a club which brought upon its members the name "Methodists," and his time became subject to even further division and regulation. Certain hours he set aside for theological discussion, and yet others for visiting the sick and prisoners in the Castle, the Oxford jail, thus entering upon the practical work among the poor and the unfortunate which he continued throughout his life.

The methodical habits so early formed at Oxford were never discontinued. Throughout the remainder of his days Wesley rose at four in the morning and commonly preached at five. He experimented and found the minimum of sleep necessary to maintain him in perfect health, and he early acquired the power of sleeping when and where he liked. His waking hours he utilized in a rigorously economical manner; hours for meditation and prayer, hours for preaching, hours for writing and study—all were expended with care and effect.

Justice to the Millerites

A SHORT time ago, The Christian Herald printed a contribution about an old gentleman who claimed to be the "last" of the "Millerites." I can give you the names of a number of intelligent Christian people, including some excellent clergymen, who were in that movement and who know all about what was done. They all absolutely deny all those "ascension robe" stories. I have been an Adventist for thirty years and prominently associated with it both East and West, and can assure you that they repudiate that story. As a denomination, Adventists have never been advocates of what is known as "Definite Time." Even in the days of Miller, before there was any denominational or church organization, the mass of believers in the imminence of the Second Advent were not advocates of what was known as "Definite Time." It is true that Miller and many of his followers did believe that Christ would come some time within the years of 1843-44. But there never were any ascension robes. The "fine linen which is the righteousness of the saints" (Rev. 19: 8) which is to be given to the Bride at the "Marriage Supper," is the only "robe" Adventists ever talk about. For many years a large sum of money has been offered to any one who would produce the proof of one of those "robe" stories, but it has never been claimed.

TAKE A RECORD
See How Many Friends Are Hurt by Coffe

It would be just as reasonable for temperance advocate to drink a little dilut whisky as to drink coffee, for one is as tr an intoxicant as the other, and persistence the use of coffee brings on a variety chronic diseases, notorious among which dyspepsia, heart palpitation (ultimately he failure), frequently constipation, kidney tr bles, many cases of weak eyes and trembli condition of the nerves.

These are only a few of the great varie of diseases which come from an unbalanc nervous system, caused by the persiste daily use of the drug caffeine, which is t active principle of coffee. Another bit prima facie evidence about coffee is that t victims to the habit find great difficulty giving it up.

They will solemnly pledge to themselv day after day that they will abandon the u of it when they know that it is shorteni their days, but morning after morning th fail, until they grow to despise themselves f their lack of self-control.

Any one interested in this subject would greatly surprised to make a systematic inqui among prominent brain-workers. There a hundreds of thousands of our most promine people who have abandoned coffee altogeth and are using Postum Food Coffee in place, and for the most excellent reasons the world. Many of them testify that health, nervous prostration and conseque inability to work has in times past push them back and out of their proper standing life, which they have been able to regain the use of good health, strong nerves a great vitality, since coffee has been thro out and Postum put in its place. Singer McGranahan Dead

AVY loss to the cause of sacred song is experienced in the death of Prof. James McGranahan, which occurred his home in Kins-, Ohio, on July 8. McGranahan had been or some time, but it supposed that his ail- t had yielded to medi- treatment and that he ht yet return to the k he so deeply loved. ot that, there was the ibility of his pen being active; but these hopes cut off by the announce- t of his death, which e unexpectedly.

Mr. McGranahan was ty-seven years of age. was born at Adams- e, Pa., and from his ly boyhood was re- kable for his fine voice. the time he had reached ge of nineteen his sphere ife was clearly indicated. He had organ- a singing class which had proved his acity for teaching as well as singing.

James McGranahan

His powers were developed under the tution of Bassini, Webb, O'Neil and George F. Root. Under these teachers the young man attained such skill that he was invited to become manager of the National Normal Musical Institute. While popularity was assured to him on the secular stage, he determined to consecrate his life to the singing of the Gospel.

With Major Whittle and with Moody and other evangelists he did excellent work, and in 1880 he made a tour of England, where he was cordially welcomed.

Among the most famous of the hymns from his prolific pen are, "There Will Be Showers of Blessings," "Some Day We Shall Understand," "Nearer Home," and "That Will Be Heaven for Me." His beautiful and inspiring Gospel songs are sung in many lands.

THE DIVINE ARCHITECT

By Mrs. M. Baxter

FTER God had brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, had taken upon himself to guide them ough the desert, had provided them h food and with water, and had made own to them his law, he called upon m to bring him an offering, and he led, "Let them make me a sanctuary, t I may dwell among them" (Ex. :8).

It is an unfathomable mystery of God's e, that he, the mighty Maker and Ruler of the universe, should con- e the thought of dwelling among h as we are! and yet more wondrous t he will dwell in us. "Ye are the ple of the living God, as God hath d, I will dwell in them, and walk in m; and I will be their God, and they all be my people; wherefore come out m among them, and be ye separate, ith the Lord, and touch not the un- an thing" (II. Cor. 6: 16, 17). "Know not that your body is a temple of the ly Ghost which is in you, which ye e from God? and ye are not your n, for ye were bought with a price; orify God therefore in your body" . Cor. 6: 19, 20, R.V.). Just as the eds of the body are the index of the art and mind which dwell within, so od wills that the bodies of his people, all their words and actions, should dicate an indwelling God.

The tabernacle was to be set up "on e first day of the first month." "Seek first the kingdom of God" (Matt. 33). Let nothing in a sanctified child f God take precedence of this fact, "I n God's dwelling-place"; and let there no occasion for the world to make y mistake that the Lord is with him, s interests are more to him than his n. Then we find that the ark of the stimony was to be placed in the Taber- cle, and covered with the veil. Here, en, was the Holy of Holies where the gh priest went "alone once every year, t without blood, which he offered for mself and for the errors of the people: e Holy Ghost this signifying, that the ay into the holiest was not yet made anifest" (Heb. 9: 7, 8).

But, blessed be God, the way into the oliest is now made by the blood of esus; the veil, which is his flesh, was ent, like the veil of the temple, from e top to the bottom, from God's side man's side, and now, not in ourselves, ut as crucified with Christ, as those who ave willingly renounced themselves in avor of Another, we, as members of the ody of our High Priest, can enter into e Holiest. But this can we only do if e "draw near with a true heart, in full ssurance of faith, having our hearts prinkled from an evil conscience." Then, he ark of the testimony, the sign and pledge of God's covenant with us, becomes manifest to the world. It was the presence and power of God with them which made the first disciples of Christ so powerful in the world; we hear nothing of their talents or learning, but we do hear that "they had been with Jesus," and that "God was with them of a truth."

The table was to be set, and the shewbread (twelve loaves) to be placed upon it (Lev. 24: 5-8) with frankincense, to testify that the bread was an offering of worship. Jesus is the Bread of Life, and as the corn has to be destroyed, ground down into powder, in order to make bread, so he was broken and died for us. But as the loaves were twelve in number they undoubtedly typified the twelve tribes of Israel, who, by laying down their wills their own lives—might become a satisfaction for God himself, "the bread of your God."

Shall We Know our Friends in Heaven?

No question has more frequently been on the Lips of the Children of Men, especially those who have laid away the Dearest Treasures of their Hearts, than the one which heads this page. Dr. Madison C. Peters, the Eminent New York Divine, whose Writings and Utterances have made him Internationally Famous, undertakes to Answer this Query in his Magnificent Work, entitled

The Great Hereafter

OR GLIMPSES OF THE COMING WORLD

I believe the saints will differ in Heaven in the glorified bodies which their souls will wear, and that the characters which they make on earth will determine their eternal bodies.

A Native Pianist

An Inland African Mission Chapel and Audience

Mutswa Chief and his Wives

BREAKING DOWN AFRICA'S IDOLS

By E. H. RICHARDS

THE writer has spent some twenty-seven years on the mission field, and has either tried or seen tried many of the usual schemes for securing the attention of native African children and winning he into the Christian life. Moral suasion is good, just s r as it will go. Industrial missions are excellent, s o far as the mission has the cash to pay the bills. h best method, open to every mission, is to take the hi out of the heathen home and plant it in a Chris- a home, where it soon learns to believe in the Gospel. ving this, the child is seldom at rest till the other bers of the family are also in possession of this great iness.

r fifteen years we tried the usual methods, and met it indifferent success. For the last ten years we have lwed the Scholarship Plan, and have doubled our ut of profitable fruitage every year during that en- eriod. Churches in the homeland have accomplished so much are indeed. We had nine members nine years ago and we have over now, while there is an average nore than 50,000 outside people ed per month.

ow is this all accomplished? The ren do pretty much the whole of . It is most interesting to found a n and watch results, which almost diately appear. A teacher is —not a learned man at all; but s good as far as the beginning of ion, and he can read hesitatingly e Testament only; but he can ch like Niagara! Lots of noise, volume, and here and there a bit of truth. He is married. is given money to sustain fifteen mission children as soon as he can e them. In six months he has them. are allowed all the little visits e they choose to make; and every they go, they preach by their ing, their quiet manners and their ding the purely heathen, all of h, though they speak not a word eir religion, teaches most power- If they talk of their faith, as do, they will the sooner bring brothers, sisters, ins, aunts and the whole connection to the mission on. This inevitably follows in the regular course of ts.

ne little bundle of saved humanity brings in a single some five or ten times the worth of his own ent" of invested capital, and these in turn bring in more, till no one this side of eternity can say how many will be saved from this source.

Our school is in session twice a day, for an hour to two hours each session. The record of the mission shows that there are ten visitors always present for each pupil all over our thirty stations, which shows the large interest, especially on the new stations. At morning and evening prayers, all who are on the station invariably attend, and aside from these, there are six times more visitors than professed worshipers. What tremendous results from so minute a planting! Is it not now proven that "To save Africa, we must save the children"? These little workers are out daily among the villages round about, sometimes visiting as many as twenty of them in a day. They sing, pray, talk, and preach to their own flesh and blood in their every action.

Starting on a 200-Mile Trip in Central Africa

Food, clothing, cooking outfit, sleeping outfit and huts for these children are all of the most primitive sort. Corn porridge, a grass hut, a loin cloth, sometimes a mat, rarely a blanket, no comb, no towel, no other item observable—this is the child's common supply while at home. Religion has no desire greatly to change these endurable and really healthful conditions. We are merely trying to make sound Christians of them and to add the Book to their possessions, also a school and a church. This is done in this region at a cost of $15 a year. Better food than at home, regular meals, two changes of clothing, a blanket, a mat, and the common housing and cooking outfit, are all included, together with constant Christian care and teaching.

There are a million of children here waiting to be taken into the missions. This is the work which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is trying to do, not only for Africa, but for other heathen lands.

In the name of these helpless, ignorant children, I invite aid in this glorious work.

Inhambane, East Africa.

Rev. J. W. Haley, another missionary in the same district, sends some interesting photographs, which appear on this page. Mr. Haley writes:

"One of the photographs is that of a native chief and his two wives. He is of the Mutswa tribe. The church and congregation at one of our stations seventy miles inland are also shown in another picture. A third shows my wife and myself on a trip of 200 miles among our stations, and a fourth shows a Muchopi playing a native piano.

"Mission work in Portuguese East Africa has had a slow but steady growth for the past fifteen years. It was not till the present system of child scholarships was introduced that there was any rapid growth. Since then a great forward movement has been in progress. It was the joining of hands of the home churches with the missionaries. This year has eclipsed all the past in reaching out into "the regions beyond." We have opened no less than eight new out-stations in places where the Gospel was never preached. We now have twenty-three regular out-stations where public service is held every morning and evening, and school taught five days a week. Those who to-day have time to study will be the teachers of to-morrow, and thus, by the natives themselves, with just bare oversight from the missionaries and a few books, the work is reaching out all over this dark land."

A SERMON BY

Rev. Henry Barton Chapin, D.D.*

The Rent Veil

TEXT: MARK 15: 37, 38

"And Jesus cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom."

WHEN the children of Israel were encamped before Mount Sinai, the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, "Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them." In obedience to this command, and in accordance with directions given them, the tabernacle was erected. This continued to be God's visible dwelling-place among his people until, about five centuries later, Solomon, acting under divine direction, erected the temple at Jerusalem, modeling it after the tabernacle.

The design of the tabernacle, and afterwards of the temple, was to set forth the doctrine of the divine inhabitation—God present and dwelling on earth. And the different courts of the temple represented different degrees of approach to God.

First. The outer wall of the temple site enclosed an area about six hundred feet square, inside of which was, first, the Court of the Gentiles, occupying the outer part of the area on all four sides. This was the largest court of all, and into it persons of all nations were permitted to enter. Here the Gentile proselytes worshiped. Beyond this court no person who was not a Hebrew was permitted to go.

The Courts of the Temple

Second. Inside the Court of the Gentiles and nine feet above it, approached by a flight of twelve steps, was the Court of the Women; so called, not because it was exclusively occupied by persons of that sex, but because they were not ordinarily allowed to go further into the interior. This court was the place where the Hebrews of both sexes performed their worship when they appeared at the temple without bringing sacrifices.

Third. Inside of the Court of the Women and about ten feet above it, approached by a flight of fifteen steps, was the Court of Israel. Into this court the males of Israel were allowed to come, to attend on the public services of religion and witness the offering of sacrifices and the solemn ceremonies that were performed in the interior adjoining court.

Fourth. Inside of the Court of Israel, and about four feet above it, was the Court of the Priests. In this court were the brazen altar for burnt offerings, the molten sea in which the priests washed, the ten lavers for washing the sacrifices, and the various utensils used in sacrificing.

Fifth. In this Court of the Priests, and about nine feet above it, stood the Sanctuary or Temple proper. This, though built of costly materials, was not of imposing dimensions, being only ninety feet long, thirty feet wide, and forty-five feet high. It faced the east, and, in addition to the beautiful porch at its entrance, consisted of two apartments. The first of these was the Holy Place, sixty by thirty feet in size, and containing the altar of incense, overlaid with gold, the ten golden candlesticks, and the table of shewbread. Into this sacred apartment only the priests were permitted to enter.

The Place of the Veil

In the rear of this was the most holy place, or Holy of Holies, a room thirty feet square, containing the Ark of the Covenant, in which were placed Aaron's rod, a golden pot of manna, and the two tables of the law given from Mount Sinai. On the top of the Ark, and constituting its lid, was the mercy-seat, made of gold, and overshadowed by two golden cherubim, whose wings met in the centre, thus forming a kind of throne, upon which God was supposed to be present, hearing and answering prayer, and dispensing mercy.

Into this most sacred place no common person, nor even an ordinary priest, could go upon pain of death. Only the high priest was permitted to enter, and that but once in the year, on the great Day of Atonement. On this day, after complying with the required conditions, he offered a bullock and a goat as a sin-offering, and then entering the Holy of Holies he carried a censer of coals with incense, causing a fragrant cloud to fill the apartment, and then sprinkled the mercy seat with the blood of the sin-offering. To preserve the secrecy of this most holy place, there was hung over the entrance a most beautiful and costly veil.

*Chaplain of the Presbyterian Home, New York City.

Such was the temple at Jerusalem; a splendid structure in itself, and in the form of its construction beautifully suggestive of an approach to God—this approach becoming closer as the worshiper, first in his own person, and then in the persons of the priests and high priest, gradually ascended from court to court, and gradually approached to the centre of the sanctuary, where, elevated above all the rest of the structure and situated in its very interior, hidden from view by a mysterious veil, was the most holy place, the special residence of the Deity.

Wonders of Calvary

Within sight of the temple, just outside the walls of Jerusalem, was the elevation called Mount Calvary, the scene of the crucifixion of our Saviour. Here, at the hour of the evening sacrifice, he was nailed to the accursed tree, to close in agony a life that had been full of hardship. He had been "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, despised and rejected of men." And now, forsaken by his disciples, mocked and reviled by the excited mob which surrounded the cross, and, above all, "smitten of God and afflicted," he was suffering a cruel and ignominious death.

When we consider all the circumstances accompanying this great event, we may well imagine that it would be attended with wonders and prodigies. It was no ordinary person who hung upon the cross between two thieves. It was no ordinary death that was being suffered. The eternal Son of God, who had veiled his glory and become incarnate, was the sufferer, laying down the life which he had taken up. Nor was he a debtor to the broken law, that he should suffer its penalty. He was no sinner against God, that he should endure his wrath and curse. As a man he had been just and holy, fulfilling the law and working righteousness, and yet he became obedient unto death. And as he hung upon the cross, his hands and feet pierced by the cruel nails, his body enduring acute torture, and his "soul exceeding sorrowful, even unto death," it was a sight at which angels might weep—a sight at which all nature might well stand aghast. And there were signs in heaven and earth. The sun hid his face and, for the space of three hours, darkness overspread the land. The earth quivered to its very centre and the rocks were rent.

The Holiest Unveiled

But an event far more significant than the convulsions of nature also occurred. When the divine sufferer gave his last cry of anguish, exclaiming "It is finished," and gave up the ghost, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom. This sacred screen, which had for so long a time concealed the most holy residence of the deity on earth, was violently torn asunder, exposing the awful place where God's presence was specially manifested.

We can imagine the cry of horror which arose from the lips of the priests who were offering the evening sacrifice within sight of this wonderful omen. We can imagine the terror of the worshipers who filled the courts below as the tidings fell upon their ears. And as the intelligence was conveyed with lightning speed from street to street of the city, "The veil of the temple is rent, the holy of holies is exposed!" men looked at one another in blank dismay.

But it was no omen of evil which had occurred. It was rather an omen of good; for this rending of the veil of the temple was significant of great and glorious truths. It spoke in clearest tones these words: "The great work of atonement is now completed. The old dispensation has now come to an end. Its ritual worship is now to cease. The barriers erected by the ceremonial law are now cast down. The darkness which has prevailed is now to pass away in the clear revelation of the Gospel. Full light is now to be let in upon the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. Free access is now to be allowed into the presence of Jehovah. Every penitent and believing sinner may now have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus. The Gentiles are now, equally with the Jews, embraced in the purposes of mercy, and whosoever will may be saved."

Such are the cheering truths symbolized in that rent veil, and we gaze upon the omen, not with terror dismay, but with unspeakable joy. Ever since man been a sinner, he has been conscious of the nee atonement to reconcile him to God. This feeling found outward expression in the offering of sacri In all the history of our race, we find sacrifice a pr nent act of worship. When the Mosaic ritual wa augurated and the ceremonial law instituted, there established a great system of sacrifices. There burnt-offerings and heave-offerings and wave-offer and the burning of incense, in which animals and products of the earth were used. Some of these s fices were to be offered daily, others less often, w the most solemn of all, the great sin-offering, was t made but once in the year, upon the great da atonement. These sacrifices were enjoined upon G chosen people by positive precept, and could not neglected with impunity.

The End of the System

At the same time this system was designed from first to be only typical in its nature, and temporar in its duration. The blood of bulls and goats could cleanse from sin, nor could the offering of a man's s stance atone for the sins of his soul. But these sa fices were necessary and valuable as types of the great sacrifice which was in the fulness of time to offered, and as aids to the faith of the worshiper i prospective Saviour. Hence when the Lord Jesus Ch appeared, offering himself a sacrifice for the sins of world, the old dispensation, with its symbolical r and ceremonies, was abrogated. And when, at death, the veil which concealed the "most holy pla was rent, it was an emphatic announcement of the that even the most solemn and impressive ceremonie the Mosaic ritual were to be celebrated no longer, that a pure spiritual worship was to take their place

Again, this event announced that full light was now be let in upon the mysteries of the heavenly kingdom. veil of the temple was for concealment, and it wa capital offense for any one to view the interior of most holy place except the high priest, and he but o in the year with imposing ceremonies. This was a s of the darkness of the old dispensation. In the Testament the true plan of salvation is set forth and sacrifice of Christ is held up to view as the only gro of the sinner's reconciliation with God. Yet in the Testament Scriptures these precious truths lack clearness with which the Gospel sets them forth. light of the old dispensation may be compared to rays which shoot up from the as yet unrisen sun, tingi the horizon and casting a glimmering light over hemisphere, while the Christian dispensation is char terized by the glorious effulgence of noonday.

As the death of the Son of God upon the cross an end to the old, it also introduced the new syste under which divine truth is so clearly revealed that wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err there In the Gospel, Christ, who is both the author and subject, makes good the word which he spake while in the flesh, saying, "I am the light of the world; that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but sh have the light of life." Oh, how clearly is the way salvation revealed to us in the Gospel of Christ! who runs may read; the simplest mind can understa it. And this clear revelation of the mystery of redem tion and of the doctrine of the Cross, is enforced by Holy Spirit, the great Interpreter, who takes of things of Christ and shows them unto us, enabling spiritually to apprehend the truth.

The Veil of Unbelief

In what a clear and glorious light has divine tru been held before men since the death of Christ and promulgation of the Gospel and the dispensation the Spirit! The only veil which now obscures this lig is unbelief—a veil of man's own raising.

But the significant event mentioned in the text accompanying the death of Christ, not only announc the end of the Mosaic ritual and the clearer revelati of the divine mysteries, but it also assures us that men may have free access to the mercy-seat. T

Lady Henry Somerset

The "Birds' Nest"

Lady Somerset's Temperance Settlement

RECENTLY it was announced that Lady Henry Somerset had retired from public life, to devote herself to rescue work among erring and inebriate women in the settlement at Duxhurst, ngland. It is now a decade since the Duxhurst home as started, the pioneer establishment of its kind. It as grown and developed, proving the wisdom of its omoters, who held that the needs of the individual ust be recognized by special care and separate hous- g provisions; that the personal, friendly example, hich is the salient feature of Christ's ministry, must be e guiding principle; and that the crushed, weak and mpted can only be helped as they are led. It is in e spirit of this conviction that she has now gone to uxhurst, there to spend the remainder of her good and eful life. On August 3 she will have reached the antage point of fifty-five years. She has been the iding spirit of Duxhurst from the beginning. It was e who conceived and brought into existence the at- active cottage colony on the sunny and sweet-scented opes of Surrey, which has been an object-lesson in rrect treatment for women who are slaves of the ink habit, and which has served to bring about eeded and better legislation for the women drunkards f Great Britain and other countries.

It is easily seen that the most important feature of the Duxhurst Colony is the novel and wise arrangement for the recognition of the individual. By assigning the women to cottages of six occupants, in charge of a nurse sister, the harm of contact with others similarly afflicted is greatly decreased. A healthy home atmosphere is created and each individual can be more readily reached with helpful influences. The cottages are simply furnished with just such equipment as every self-respecting laborer ought to have at home—clean, dainty, and pretty. The women take great pride in what they call "our little homes"; and they return to their own domiciles with a new mental image as to what a home should be like.

They are given active employment and industrial training. They take part in the various industries which have been started on the estate, such as the care of poultry, beekeeping, dairy work, flower-culture, jam-making and a certain amount of laundry and needle-work. Pleasant outdoor exercise and occupation is found to be the best restorative for weakened nerves and wills. The indoor occupations include basket-making, by which a good supply of baskets is produced for home use and for sale; seed-sorting, which provides a profitable winter occupation. Much attention is given to weaving and knitting, the products being dress-materials, huckaback towels, tablecloths, etc., all of which find a market and help to support the enterprise.

It is required that each patient shall have a guarantee of five shillings ($1.25) a week before entering; but if she is able to earn enough to pay her expenses through the week, anything over that is placed to her credit and at the end of her stay in the home is handed back to her in the form of wages. The cost of maintenance considerably exceeds the receipts from the patients, reaching as high as $20,000 in a single year, while the income is about $10,000. Nearly 14,000 pounds, or about $70,000, is the investment at Duxhurst, the last remaining sum having been collected as a surprise gift fund for Lady Henry Somerset, on her birthday, by the British Woman's Temperance Association.

Lady Henry Somerset goes about at Duxhurst from cottage to cottage, visiting with and speaking loving words of personal spiritual help and encouragement to the inmates, who regard her as a veritable angel of mercy. She lives in a centrally located little thatched cottage, simply furnished like the rest; and her usual attire is that of the nurse, full skirt, apron, cap and kerchief.

The Disaster on the Battleship Georgia

Captain Henry McCrea

AT one moment a calm blue sea, dotted with the white hulls of ships, a great battleship steaming slowly, its crew at target practice, dropping their shells through he distant target with the unerring accuacy of American seamen; the next, a linding flash, a concussion that made the Georgia reel as if storm-struck, silent orms stretched on the iron deck, men ising and falling in the deadly fumes of he smokeless powder, and cutters from he fleet churning the water to foam as hey dashed in with assistance—such were he two scenes that followed each other vith lightning-like rapidity, when a little drifting spark caused an explosion in the ear turret of one of America's finest ves- els, and sent more than a dozen brave officers and men into eternity, while over a score will bear to the grave the marks of their terrible experience.

The North Atlantic Squadron of several cruisers and four battleships, of which the Georgia was one, under the command of Admiral Charles M. Thomas, was cruising off Cape Cod, in Massachusetts Bay, for the purpose of target practice. Captain Henry McCrea had hoisted his flag as commander of the Georgia that morning. Lieutenant Goodrich was in command of the after superimposed turret. He had with him Midshipmen Kimball, Goldthwaite and Cruse and twenty men. The starboard gun had just sent a shell whistling toward the target.

A new shell was inserted and two bags of powder had been lifted up the ammunition hoist to recharge the gun. The loader at the gunbreech took the bags in his arms and was about to insert them. Suddenly it seemed to him as if the turret was smoky. He glanced down at the bags. On one of them was a black spot, showing that the charge had ignited and was now smouldering. He pushed them forward, and with a shout threw himself flat on the turret floor. Two others who had caught sight of the black spot did likewise. The rest of the crew, however, did not understand the warning until with a blinding flash both bags of powder exploded. Several were killed outright and many were made mercifully unconscious. Those who still were able to move staggered about in the poisonous gases trying to find an exit. Wild with pain some managed to reach the ladder, where they were met by Captain McCrea and the officers and crew from other parts of the ship, who were rushing in to find the cause of the trouble. One glance told the story, and almost frantically all set to work to rescue the wounded. One by one they were brought out on deck. Some regained consciousness only to feel the horrible smart of their wounds. Lieutenant Goodrich and one other, burned in some places to the bone, threw themselves into the sea. The salt water only intensified their agony, as they struggled in the waves. With great difficulty they were drawn into a launch and lifted tenderly on the main deck.

The admiral of the fleet, on discovering the extent of the disaster, ordered the Georgia to steam at once for Boston. There Lieutenant Goodrich and several of his men died.

RESULTS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S RELIEF WORK REVIEWED
HOW THE FLOUR WAS DISTRIBUTED

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

HUAIAN, May 7.

TWO hours ago I saw the first sack of Buford flour delivered to a starving applicant. It was a man, gray-haired, gaunt, grateful, if grave eyes filled with new light, joined palms lifted in salute mean aught. The second sack went to a withered crone with half a dozen mouths to feed; the third to a girl not more than twelve and barely able to shoulder and carry away the half hundredweight of life-saving food.

It was from the deck of one of three junks, towed with infinite difficulty from Chinkiang, that the delivery was made. It was supervised by Rev. H. M. Woods, D.D., a missionary of twenty-five years' service in China, and whose house—comfortable, according to Oriental ideas—is in the centre of Huaian (pronounced Wheean) a prominent walled city of 150,000 people, situate on the Grand Canal, at the southern edge of the famine district, and for months a principal distributing point for American relief. Dr. Woods was assisted by Messrs. Brown and Espey, young missionary volunteers from Shanghai, who for months have undergone physical hardships, mental distress, dangers from violence and disease, in order that they might save lives.

The junk, with its 1,380 sacks of CHRISTIAN HERALD flour, was moored on the west bank of the Grand Canal, opposite the city. To the left and on top of the bank was a Buddhist temple, and through a narrow stockade built to keep away the importunate crowds, and leading into the temple court, passed long lines of coolies bearing the cargo of sacks from another junk. In the very store-room in which the pile of flour sacks rose, was a glass-covered niche from which beamed a placid Buddha.

From a third junk coolies were bearing flour to the eastern gate of Huaian, where another relief station has been established. Government police, or men employed by the missionaries to act as guards, are everywhere present, and of successful thievery there is a negligible quantity.

Up the Grand Canal

Our three junks brought 5,000 sacks of flour, and the inefficient launch Chianguan No. 493 had a hard time of it. We left Chinkiang Tuesday afternoon, and were in the mouth of the Grand Canal by 5 P.M. Yet, though we traveled late at night, we had made but two thirds of the 300 li (100 miles), to this place by yesterday afternoon, when we ran aground in mid-canal, broke off one of the blades of our propeller, and would have been in bad case had it not been for the arrival, down canal, of the big launch Chun Lun, belonging to the Chinkiang Committee. This boat turned about and landed us here this morning, where we were welcomed and breakfasted by Dr. Woods and his wife.

Very soon after breakfast the chief official of the city and district, Magistrate Sun, a handsome young nobleman, paid me an official call. Sun and Yung Chang, head of the district telegraph service, who accompanied him, were profuse in their expressions of gratitude to the donors of the flour; asked me to send their message of thanks to America, and said the kindness of our people would always bloom fresh in Chinese hearts, as showing brotherhood of the practical sort.

About 300 li (100 miles) to the north of Antung, a relief station 90 li northeast from Huaian, is a district untouched by relief of any sort, native or foreign. It lies away from main traveled roads, is difficult of access, and, like many thousands of square miles of area to the westward, was part of the famine's mystery-haunted stronghold. Recently Chinese officials made an investigation in this part of Kiangsu and ordered a census of living and dead. On the most conservative lines the ante-famine population is given at 100,000 (it is not a large district), and the death rate since February 1 at forty per cent. There is no reasonable doubt that in the relatively small patch of country in question 40,000 human beings have died from starvation within the last three months. When one thinks of Anhui, Honan and other provinces, it is easy to believe the estimate of missionaries, taotai, magistrates and others interested, that millions have died of hunger and destitution since 1907 dawned.

Now, look on the pleasanter side. Through the efforts of the missionaries in distributing from wisely located stations the relief provided by America (and largely by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), the death rate in reachable parts of the province of Kiangsu (estimated to have a population exceeding 11,000,000) has been kept astonishingly near the normal. Of deaths there have been plenty, but the great majority thereof are to be credited to the refugees from the unhelped regions above referred to.

The death rate in the localities relieved, unquestionably would have been as great as in the northern district, where forty per cent. fell victims to hunger, cold, destitution and disease. It is computed that the $800,000 (Mexican) or thereabouts, contributed through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Relief Fund, saved MORE THAN 800,000 LIVES. Truly this must give a satisfactory glow to every contributor to the fund—and we can thank the indefatigable, fearless, altruistic and maligned missionary for the superb accomplishment.

Another accomplishment by these same missionaries. There has been neither pauperization nor half-way help. People have worked for their food-buying wage when not too old, too young or too ill, and they have been carried over to harvest time—are even being carried beyond it when they have lost home as well as hope of harvest, as in the case of the thousands upon thousands of refugees who have been cared for at relief stations.

The deeper I get into the stricken region, the m I see and learn of relief work, the prouder I am of Americanism, the gladder I am over the generosity CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

I have said little or nothing of the horrors of famine-stricken region. I shall not descant upon th God knows they are real enough—affecting enou terrible enough. Within the last few days I have s more emaciation than you could find in the Uni States from one end to the other believe. It is impossible to concei much less describe conditions in th densely populated centres. Like visitors, I am surrounded by crowds tatterdemalions—some begging with persistence that would make a Neap itan lazzarone blush, some mutely f lowing, as anything is better than lyi in the fly-haunted sun-spots around t city walls. There are roughs here in all communities, Western or Easter and at first the missionaries went fear of assault. There have been rio for bread and emeutes fostered by bri ands who hoped to profit by cons quent rapine and looting. But t people as a whole have been patie and thankful, kindly-disposed an willing to work or to wait.

Cold water is the best ammunitio against over-crowding round the reli stations. This morning I saw thou sands of postulating, yelling, protes ing claimants driven from the gang planks of the distributing junk b deftly thrown canal water, ladled o of the stream and distributed with ab solute impartiality until order wa gained and the work could go o swiftly. In some cities a fire hose ha been found infallible as a disperser of crowds. Alway the police have pieces of split bamboo with which the thwack persistent crowders, the resultant of sound bein far greater than that of pain.

The work of distribution is now well-nigh over. Suc crops as there are, are being gathered, and the mission aries must rest. This is imperative unless they kil themselves. Already the heat at noon is intense, and i will grow more intense as the year advances.

To-morrow, by canal launch or on the hurricane deck of a Chinese donkey (about big enough for a watch charm), McCrea and I will hie to the northward, to Tsingkiangpu, Antung, maybe far-off Kaowan.

The Front Door of a Relief Station at Tongkow

Punishing the Thieves who Stole the Flour

The Centre of Relief Work

TSINGKIANGPU, May 10.

Tsingkiangpu, 400 li (130 miles) north of Chinkiang, has been the focal point of the famine relief work. It is a city of 130,000 to 140,000 inhabitants, normally, and here the Grand Canal is first broken by locks, of which three, at intervals of a few miles, serve to lift the cargo junks above the rapids.

From Tsingkiangpu trends the great road to Peking, 500 miles or more away to the northward, which for tens of centuries has been the main traveled highway for the busy myriads of the great provinces along the sea.

Tsingkiangpu ("Bank of the Clear River" is the Chinese interpretation and clearly a misnomer nowadays, as the water is dirty and the river is a canal) is not an ancient city, as the Orientals count age. Ten miles to the southward lies Huaian, of which I wrote a few days ago. Both are walled places and nearly equal as to population, but here the resemblance ends. Tsingkiangpu, with its probable 2,000 years or less of existence, is official and commercial; Huaian, which may have been a magistrate's town when Abraham dwelt in tents, is the abode of wealthy gentry and the home of many Chinese scholars of repute.

From Tsingkiangpu reach out roads to all parts of Eastern and Northern Kiangsu and a carry of less than three miles brings one to Salt River, really a canal and suitable for small junks. It is by way of the Salt that 25,000 sacks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD flour, now en route up the canal, will be sent to Antung, thence to be barrowed into the farther north.

Outside the walls Mr. Rice, a missionary, showed me a handsome brick flour mill, capacity 500 sacks (about

Six Hundred Destitute Boys, as they Appeared after Two Months of Good Food and Care

6 barrels) per day. The Chinese owners took Mr. ce over the mill when it started, and called his par-ular attention to the machinery. It was at the height the Chinese boycott against any and everything Amer-n, and the Chinaman said:

"You see, sir, all this grand machinery is from Great itain, and very splendid and good it is."

"Is it possible?" replied Mr. Rice. "Then how do u account for these names of American cities—New rk, Cleveland, Buffalo, etc.—or for the many U. S. tents recorded, all of them in letters of steel on these chines you call so splendid?"

The Chinaman could not account for them, save by eging that the English had cheated him.

To-day, in company with Dr. Woods, I visited the e of the great refugee camp of Tsingkiangpu, and in oks and corners are huddled, even yet, the aged, the ry young and orphaned, the sick and the crippled, to om travel is an absolute impossibility.

Yesterday, the last refugee camp over which the ssionaries had supervision was broken up. There re several hundred and they were for the most part ofessional beggars or the output of the city's slums.

Work for Famine Refugees

One of the admirable works of the missionaries was clear the streets of Tsingkiangpu of the hundreds who rbored along the curb and would have spread a pesti-ce had they been allowed to remain. With the help of e officials these sick and sore ones were gathered into mps outside the city and given all possible relief, th as to food and medical attention. Dr. Woods has hospital and infirmary here, but the vastness of the ed has made it a small factor in the supply of relief.

I rode out to see an old canal some three miles off, redigging which the missionaries had given employ-ent to some 4,700 refugees. Rev. A. D. Rice, who d charge of the workers, accompanied me. Our way n through the thousands on thousands of the conical aves that take up so much available land in this untry. Here and there were tombs of priests, with posing headstones and circumscribing groves of unted pines. But earth was the usual wear of the ad, each cone (for all the world like the ant-hills of ner Africa) surmounted by a clay image of a hat—metimes fashioned like a bishop's mitre, again like an our-glass, or rarely spherical, with the mortar-board the student overtopping all. Here and there were esh graves, into which were thrust bamboo splints rapped with paper. If the paper was smooth it de-oted that deceased had left as many children as there ere sticks; if rough, grandchildren were indicated. I ssed one grave with five smooth-papered splints and ven with the rough. "That will be an honored an-stor indeed," said Mr. Rice. "She will have many worship her, now that she is dead and throned in the Chinese heaven—or so her descendants honestly believe."

Everywhere were evidences of careful husbandry. Most of the small farms were in wheat and the yield was wretched. Bugs and worms and drought had cut the crop into half, or less, of the usual output. In scores of places a small ox was dragging a corrugated cylinder of stone across a threshing-floor that might have been lifted bodily from the Palestine of the days of Solomon.

There were hundreds of tracts of poppies—a few in gorgeous bloom, but most of them yielding the deadly gum to the evening incision and the scraping knife. We are told that the anti-opium law is to be enforced with rigid severity throughout the empire. The Taotai of Shanghai has ordered all opium dens in the native city closed on the 22d of June, and says he means "closed" in all the word implies. Yet the missionaries note that the area devoted to the cultivation of the poppy increases yearly—is greater this year than ever.

The crops of beans and peanuts looked well, and rice is of fair promise, but of sweet potatoes—a staple—there is scarce a vestige. The few sent for seed were rotten, or were devoured by the hungry farmers. I speak generally concerning the province. There are exceptions where the yield will be or has been abundant; but in the famine-infested districts,the crops in the main are far from satisfactory. Still it may be said, in a broad sense, that while the famine is not over, its vigor for the present is abated by the crops and the relief accorded. The death list will be greatly augmented by disease, which is growing more prevalent daily, from Chinkiang to Tsingkiangpu, and the dreaded typhus has already claimed many victims, while fevers, variously styled "malarial," "relapsing," "typhoid," and "famine," are rife in all the cities and towns within or near to the famine district.

Hostility to the relief work, on the part of most of the officials, soon disappeared. Here and there were recalcitrants, especially among the rural gentry or "elders." In a case mentioned by Dr. J. B. Woods one of these elders, coupled in relief work with a Chinese gentleman who wanted to do well, was ugly, fault-finding, obstructive. To him the district magistrate sent this message:

"You stop your tricks, your opposition, your fault-finding. Go to work with your colleague and the missionaries in this public work now devised. Go to work quick and work hard or I'll squeeze you dry."

The elder knew the magistrate to be a man of his word and he obeyed.

The aggregate of the workers and their helpers at all the relief stations will not fall short of 100,000 men and boys. An approximate of deaths from drowning, disease and starvation, since January 1, is given by one missionary at 2,000,000, including deaths in Anhui and Honan, and in Kiangsu by a minor Chinese official at 1,300,000. I feel very sure the figures are under rather than over the truth.

Flour Stealers Punished

CHINKIANG, June 12.

As Mr. McCrea and I came swiftly down the Grand Canal, we passed twenty big two-masted junks, their enormous sails spread full to the strong and favoring breeze from the southwest. These, each with from 1,200 to 2,000 sacks of CHRISTIAN HERALD flour in its hold, were bound for far-off Yaowan, hitherto unhelped of foreign relief, and the distant country beyond Antung, where the flour will be a perfect godsend.

The Buford's cargo required fifty-four big junks for transport on the Grand Canal, and thirty-four have been towed by steam launches under control of the Committees or that of the Taotai of Chinkiang. Ten of these launches have been engaged in this service.

It was necessary, in order that the Buford should not be delayed, that some of the unloading be done at night. The Taotai shook his head over this, saying, "There will be pilfering, I fear," and Walker was apprehensive; but the tally showed that thievery had not been extensive. Some sacks had been stolen bodily and others pilfered from to a small extent. Accordingly, the district magistrates ordered a careful search for the culprits. Two boatmen were found who had stolen several pounds each—just how many does not appear. These were haled before the nearest district magistrate and sentenced at once to have their necks encircled for a week by the big cangues (wooden collars, square-shaped, heavy and padlocked so that they cannot be removed without a key), and to be exposed with this cumbrous neck-wear in public places, where the crowd hoots not only at the thief, but at the fellow who was caught at it. The magistrate further ordered that the sampan of the two thieves be sawed in two, the halves erected in a public spot on the river bank and labeled with the names of the thieves and the reason for these monuments to their shame.

But there was bigger game. In one junk were found thirty sacks of CHRISTIAN HERALD flour. The magistrate had the thief bastinadoed (and a beating with bamboo staves is a serious affair), while upon the owner of the junk a fine of $200 (Mexican) was inflicted. The fine was paid and at once sent to Mr. Walker, who used it to buy more flour.

I have just received a message from Mr. Yung, Taotai of Chinkiang, that he greatly desires to see the representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in order that he may hear of conditions to the northward and that he may wire to His Excellency Tuanfang, viceroy of the Lianking Provinces, the date of my arrival in Nanking, whither I expect to go on the morrow.

A Glorious Work in China

OUR Special Commissioner on the Chinese famine field, Mr. E. R. Johnstone, in his correspondence which appears elsewhere in this issue, summarizes the results of the remarkable life-saving campaign in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers, together with its newspaper allies throughout the country, have been engaged during the last four months.

His estimates are conservative and are drawn from thoroughly reliable missionary and native official sources. All agree in placing the number of men, women and children who have been saved from death by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund, at eight hundred thousand souls!

This news must bring a thrill of satisfaction and thankfulness to the hearts of all who have had a share in this Christlike enterprise. The work has been blessed beyond our highest hopes and expectations. It has brought new life, strength, courage and joy into a multitude of the homes of sorrow and despair. It has been to the Chinese a convincing illustration of that real, vital Christianity which reaches out hands full of help, lifts up the suffering, feeds the hungry, clothes the naked. Every sack of flour on the Buford was an object-lesson of the right sort, which all the people, high and low, deeply appreciated.

We heartily congratulate each and every contributor to the Relief Fund upon this glorious consummation of their efforts. Surely, the seal of divine approval has been upon it from the very beginning. Not a single gift, nor any prayer, was unacknowledged. Their great outpouring of love and sympathy has had a rich reward.

We also extend our cordial congratulations to those journals in many States which aided so generously in carrying forward this great work of benevolence. Nor would we forget our government, which, through the State Department, gave substantial assistance by chartering ships to carry the food cargoes and affording other valuable facilities.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its proprietor and editors, are profoundly grateful that this journal has once more been used as the channel for a great benevolence, which has resulted in the saving of so many precious lives. Let us hope that the seed sown may produce an abundant spiritual harvest, and that many of the Chinese may be won over to the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

Vagaries of the Dog Days

WITH the mercury in the nineties and torridity everywhere; with humanity wilting and worried by steaming hot days and sleepless nights, it is not surprising that the "midsummer madness" of the dog days should make itself felt among the statesmen and makers of public opinion, as well as among the undistinguished.

There is probably no more reasonable way of accounting for the vagaries that are noted at this season among those who are usually conservative and even judicially calm in their actions and utterances. May it not be true, after all, that the hot waves are to blame for the recent outbreak of "jingoism"—which, fortunately, has now spent itself? And now comes the regulation crop of hot weather sensations, calculated to excite wonder, though hardly to produce conviction. There is the mile-a-minute boat which is to "revolutionize navigation," and which will skip like a bird from wave-top to wave-top. There is the new dirigible armed military balloon, a flying terror, of which, we are gravely assured, France has a hundred ready on her frontier, while Germany has such a fleet of submarines that the wags of Europe's leading journals have concluded that "if the future of France is in the air, that of Germany is under the water." Even the phlegmatic Britishers are just now enjoying their midsummer sensation in the published charges that the redoubtable channel fleet is "unfit" and "unready." Queen Wilhelmina's guests at The Hague have talked little else but war since the Peace Conference met. Indeed, there is hardly a community in Europe or America that is not feeling the effect in some way or other of the potential solar influence, which seems to stir up distrust and belligerency where harmony and good fellowship should prevail.

Let us keep cool—if we can. If we eat temperately, dress lightly, attend to our daily duties, keep out of the sun as much as possible, avoid crowds, pay our honest debts, cultivate the spirit of mutual love and helpfulness and say our prayers regularly, we will have little to fear from the "hot waves." Careless diet and reckless exposure are responsible for nine out of every ten cases of sunstroke and "heat hysteria." We do not accommodate ourselves to our climatic necessities. If we did, there would be fewer sunstrokes in our big cities and an occurrence like that in Philadelphia, where thousands were overcome and women who had stood for hours under a broiling sun dropped "like leaves," would be imposssible.

Mr. Choate's Plea for Arbitration

IT is gratifying to know that the first clear and definite plea for a general arbitration treaty has been made at The Hague by the American representatives. Mr. Joseph H. Choate's speech of July 18, in committee, was the strongest presentation of the attitude of this government that could have been desired. He pointed to the fact that since the last Conference two great wars had occurred, which led to international agreements of arbitration, and these had been successfully carried out.

"There is no reason," he argued, "why nations that agree between each other, or two by two, should not agree all together to exactly the same thing." He also referred to the excellent work in behalf of peace accomplished by the recent Pan-American Conferences. These events, in conjunction with the growing demand of an enlightened civilization, had encouraged the United States to advocate general arbitration under the official auspices of the Hague Court. His concluding words were:

> At the proper time we shall ask for an opportunity to explain our views on the project we have offered for fortifying the present Permanent Court of Arbitration and for the organization therefrom of a tribunal which shall compel the confidence of nations, and be the necessary sequence of the general arbitration agreement which we now offer.

These are strong, bold, noble words, and they strike the true key-note of the world's desire for peace. While the general arbitration plan may be defeated in the present Conference, the setback will only be temporary. We believe the day is coming when the statesmen of all lands will accept the principle that there is no human quarrel, between governments or individuals, that cannot be settled by arbitration.

The greatest glory of The Hague conference will be attained when it assumes the "moral tutelage" of the various governments it represents. Many a bitter conflict may arise before this goal is reached, and before the Court of Peace is legally established as a tribunal whose judgments will be upheld by the united strength and power of the nations.

The Ownership of One's Face

SINCE the invention of the small hand camera and its manufacture at a cheap price, the number of "kodak fiends" has been constantly on the increase. There is, of course, a legitimate field for their efforts in photographing historic buildings, beautiful landscapes, or the faces of people who have no objection to having their photographs taken. Much vexation, however, has been caused by the indiscriminate "snap-shotting" of people who have no desire to have their faces scattered about the country in collections or ornamenting the pages of the Sunday newspapers. People who have done anything to bring them into public notice are hounded by these "kodak fiends," who pursue their victims by the hour, taking them in all sorts of poses, usually ungraceful, for the unfortunates are usually on the move. Women possessing the slightest claim to good looks are photographed in order to gratify the tastes of thousands who only know them through the public prints. Within the last few years, a number of cases have come up in our courts, where women have objected to the use of their photographs on advertisements.

Germany is the first to teach a lesson to the "kodak fiends." We are apt to think of Germany as a country that sometimes carries its paternalism too far; but its laws do much to protect the individual from irresponsible persons. Its recent kodak law maintains the right of the individual to his own features. According to its provisions, a photographer must first secure the permission of the person he wishes to photograph, and he must also secure the owner's permission to photograph his possessions. While the second part of the law may be deemed drastic, the first will have the approval of every right-minded person. A similar law would not be out of place in this country. Freedom of action does not mean freedom to annoy.

Heroes in Peace

SEVERAL times within a few years the Ameri people have been shocked by some terrible cat trophe on our warships—disasters usually costing ma lives. Our fleet has been provided with every kno safety device, yet explosions seem bound to oc where men handle powder as part of the daily rout of their life in the service.

The fine results of naval discipline were never m apparent than during the awful disaster on the batt ship Georgia. Every man proved himself a hero peace as he would one of war, if the people of the co try needed him for their defense. One man, torn by explosion, heroically reached up to close the breech the second gun, so that no more lives would sacrificed. Another, also badly injured, closed connection with the magazine. The self-denial of t wounded was enough to touch the most hardened. T spirit of comradeship in the service, if copied in everyd life, would do much toward making this world what should be. They did not murmur at their own sufferir but every now and then one of these burned and bar aged boys in blue would rouse himself long enough ask, "How are the other fellows getting on?"

Do we, who are not of the service, often ask ourselv the same question? If we did, perhaps there would many more heroes in peace, even if they never trod t deck of a battleship. Both branches of the service unde go danger and hardship unrecognized by the gener public. The men in uniform have in some places be looked down upon. It is to be hoped that it will not ne a series of disasters to show the public what a fine boc of men are safeguarding their interests at sea.

Among the Workers

—MRS. MARY L. ALLEN, a devoted American missionary in Lib ria, West Africa, passed away on April 19. She had been aili for some weeks and, so her associates write, "was greatly ove worked."

—REV. J. T. GRACEY, the venerable president of the Clift Springs International Missionary Union has been re-elected f the twenty-fifth time. Vice-President David McConaughy, of t Presbyterian Board, is now acting president. The programm this year in the Conference centred in the thought of the spee evangelization of the world.

—MR. S. C. K. RUTNAM, M. A., and family, of Colombo, Ceylo arrived in New York July 18. Mr. Rutnam is principal of Centr College, and his wife is engaged in medical work among th women and children in Colombo. Mr. Rutnam is a Hindoo, an was in this country ten years ago. He is well known as a lecture on Eastern questions, and has often occupied American pulpit He may be addressed in care of this journal.

—"WHAT MAKES you women so different from us?" a Mohamm dan woman in Persia asked of Miss McLean, of the Presbyteria Mission. "Is it what you eat? Won't you make me a dress jus like yours, so that I may look like you?" Miss McLean made he the dress, and she confesses that the woman was not a pretty pi ture when arrayed in it. "I haven't got the look yet," she said as she came back, disappointed. "There is something in you eyes that isn't in ours." What made the difference was the ligh of Christ shining within.

ewitt's Swift Vessel

ARINE engineers have been startled by the novel invention of Mr. Peter er Hewitt, the discoverer of the fa- "Cooper Hewitt" light. The inven- cannot properly be called a boat, since es not lie in the water, but is intended de over its surface. Mr. Hewitt calls gliding craft," and predicts that it attain a speed of a mile a minute. ough model, which is far from perfect, ested recently, and attained a speed ng Island Sound of thirty-eight miles our. The craft consists of a strong e frame, from each corner of which, ndicular arms reach to the surface of ater. To the arms are fastened steel ing planes. The craft thus glides on flat shoes or skates. The motor is set ard, and the single screw turns just d of the front sets of planes. On r side of the shell is a gasoline tank. eration the screw driving or pulling craft forward, forces the slightly ed planes through the water and, on nt of their slant, the craft is forced ard. The greater the speed the higher craft rises.

gineers who have examined the craft, nderstand its principles as a non-pro- sional person cannot do, declare that it great future before it and will revo- utionize the present system of ocean el. A sanguine French engineer ex- ed the opinion that, when fully devel- , it would travel to Liverpool in thirty s. Mr. Hewitt makes no such claims, admits that its power and speed may definitely increased. So the progress creasing speed of travel by sea, as by continues, and our time is justifying prediction of the ancient prophet:

ny shall run to and fro and knowledge shall reased. (Dan. 12 : 4.)

n old barn door that had been swinging ts rusty hinges for more than half a ury and which had faced the wintry s and summer storms and beating suns brought into Richmond, Ind., recently a farm west of the town, and after g carefully packed, was sent by ex- s to a mansion on the banks of the son, the summer home of a New York timillionaire. It appears that the mil- aire formerly lived and worked on that n, which was owned by his parents. He ntly went out to visit the haunts of his hood. On the face of the barn door he eld his own initials, deeply carved in oaken board of the middle panel by self when a boy. "Some of the hap- t days of my life as a boy were spent ind that old door," he remarked, "and etermined, if possible, to secure the r on which my own knife had cut those e letters." He could not buy the farm, even the barn, but was allowed to buy door at a large price. It is well for a n if, at the close of his life, when con- ted with something that he did in his lier years, it proves to be something t gives him satisfaction and calls up asant reminiscences. There is so much t a man does in his younger days that is anxious to forget and to have God for- e.

emember not the sins of my youth, nor my isgressions; according to thy mercy remember u me. (Ps. 25 : 7.)

ernational Kites

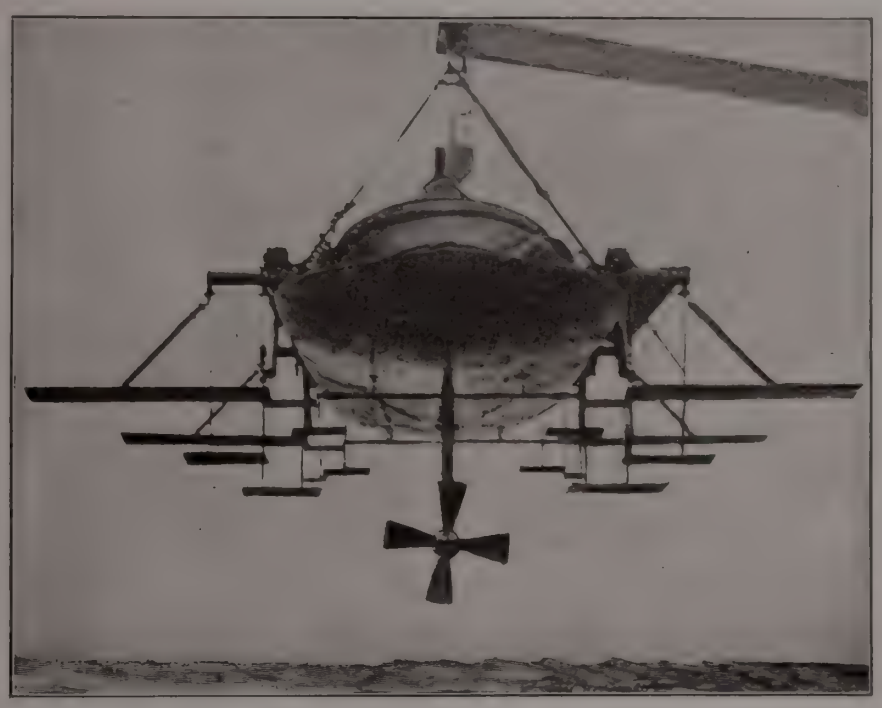
Arrangements have been made to send twenty kites in different parts of the rld in an attempt to solve the problem foreseeing and foretelling the character approaching weather. The various na- ns have been at last led to recognize t they are as much interested as we in weather predictions and have consented to co-operate with us to the extent of providing the kites and making observations. The New York Times holds that "if enough observations at enough places are taken by the right men, the prompt co-ordination of the data secured would almost certainly make weather prediction into accurate announcement, and the resulting benefits would be incalculable. Our own service, if not yet very good, is the best in the world, simply because our weather moves regularly from west to east and can easily be watched as it goes. But we study at too few places only the confused lower air and do little more than guess at the upper currents that are the real determining factors. It is to remedy this fault that the kite scheme has been devised." Meteorologists are not the only people that have been making that mistake. It is a common practice to study the confused lower currents of life and philosophy and ignore the upper currents, which as God and his servants have long warned us are the "real determining factors."

Why, seeing times are not hid from the Almighty, do they that know him not see his days? (Job 24 : 1.)

A Mistake in a Sentence

A bill has been introduced into the Legislature of Alabama, to render such compensation as is possible to an aged, needy woman. That she has just cause for complaint none doubt; least of all the courts and judges. It appears that many years ago her only daughter, a girl of twelve years old, was arraigned for larceny. She was tried hurriedly and convicted. The penalty for the crime was imprisonment for about two years, and the judge thought twenty months would be sufficient. He therefore gave sentence to that effect. But the courts at that time were somewhat crudely administered, and the clerk in making out the papers wrote "years" instead of "months." The girl was sent to the penal settlement and was kept there until she died a short time ago. She had been in confinement, working for the State, for nearly twenty years. Neither she nor her mother had any intelligent friends, and both were densely ignorant, so that they did not know a mistake had been made. It was only when the girl died, as she was nearing the time of her liberation, that the blunder was discovered. A man for whom the mother worked, heard of the girl's death and learned of her sentence. He traced the matter and discovered the mistake. It was too late then to do anything for the girl, but an attempt is being made, through this bill in the Legislature, to give the mother payment for the excess of the daughter's imprisonment. It is astonishing that in this enlightened country such a blunder should have been possible and should not have been detected. Events such as this make the future life a necessity to divine justice, for by it alone can the wrongs of this life be made right.

There is nothing hid which shall not be manifested; neither was anything kept secret but that it should come abroad. (Mark 4: 22.)



The New Gliding Craft Invented by Mr. Peter Cooper Hewitt

The Emperor of Korea Abdicates

Korea's long crisis has ended in the abdication of the Emperor. It is difficult, in view of the version of the trouble coming through Japanese hands, to form an intelligent opinion of the causes that have combined to bring about the crisis. There is a strong suspicion that Japan has sought to exercise a too stringent control over the kingdom, and that this has provoked the hostility of the Emperor, of his ministers and of the people at large. When it was evident that a crisis had developed, the Marquis Ito and Viscount Hayashi proceeded at once to Seoul to protect Japanese interests. They protested against the course of the Emperor in sending a deputation to the Peace Conference at the Hague. This act the Japanese regard as a violation of the agreement between Korea and Japan by which Japan was absolutely to control the external relations of Korea. The ministers of the Emperor fully realized the consequences of his having offended Japan and urged him to go in person to Tokio and apologize. Finally the Emperor held a long, all-night conference with his ministers, and eventually yielded to their urgent appeal to him to save the country by abdicating. It is not by any means certain that even that course will save Korea from being absorbed by Japan, but it was evidently the only course that had any hope in it. The abdication, therefore, was formally made. Of the aspirants to the throne who may succeed him, the Emperor's eldest son stands first, but he is said to be an imbecile. Another is Prince Pak Yun Ho, whom the Emperor had banished, but whom he had recalled at the request of Japan. He and two other candidates, who have claims on the throne, are distinctly pro-Japanese in their policy, and it is understood that the accession of any one of the three would be acceptable to the Japanese. The condition of the country is critical and the outcome will probably be its annexation by Japan.

The Korean Emperor and his Son

He removeth kings, and setteth up kings: he giveth wisdom unto the wise and knowledge to them that know understanding. (Daniel 2: 21.)

A Martyr to Research

There was a sorrowful funeral recently from the medical department of the University of Berlin. It was that of Professor Maximilian Schuller, whose death had occurred in spite of the skill and efforts of the most able physicians in the world. He was well known in the university because of his success in the treatment of cancer. He believed he had discovered a cure for the dread disease and was anxiously watching some experiments he was making. It was necessary that the cultures he was preparing should be kept exactly at blood heat, following the variations in the temperature of the human body. He had a cartridge belt made that would hold the test tubes, and he placed them in it and wore it around his own body in contact with his skin. His friends, who knew what he was about to do, protested against the experiment and warned him of the risk he was running. The professor, however, was resolved. Exactly what had been predicted, occurred. An accidental blow broke one of the tubes, his skin was punctured, and the deadly culture passed into his blood. In spite of all that could be done, he contracted an acute cancer and died in three months. The professor was doubtless aware of the risk he ran, but hoped to avoid such an accident as that which broke the tubes and liberated the culture. It was a high degree of devotion, but it did not attain to that of Him who knew the inevitable cost of the undertaking by which he provided a remedy for sin-stricken humanity, yet did not shrink from it.

Being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. (Phil. 2: 8).

THE ADMIRAL AND THE WAIFS

EVERYBODY who visited Mont-I awn on July 4 and heard the gallant Admiral Sigsbee speak to the assembled children, and saw with what zest he entered into the whole patriotic programme of that day, must have been convinced that the redoubtable sea-fighter was thoroughly enjoying his visit. But the impressions he then received seem to have been lasting ones, as the following enthusiastic letter written to Dr. Klopsch from Washington clearly shows. It is one of the finest tributes ever paid to our "Children's Paradise" and its management, and as so many of our readers are personally interested in the Home, we print the admiral's letter below:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1907.

"Dear Dr. Klopsch:

"I am back in Washington after my visit to Tarrytown and Nyack. This is to thank you, rather more formally than heretofore, for my outing at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack. That I greatly enjoyed my visit to the Children's Home on July 4 and again on July 5 must have been quite obvious to you and to all. In view of the downright hard labor that you, in person, and your clever and cheery assistants give to the welfare of the children, may I assume that my impressions will not be amiss?

"I have the naval habit of mind in respect to organization, which tends to discover flaws and to correct them. Therefore you were harboring an adverse critic. At first flush, I feared that there was a bit too much organization, that the children were kept together in a body rather too much, and directed too much. Later, as I saw the results, I entirely reversed my opinion. I remembered that in all gatherings of small children for their enjoyment their fun must be organized and directed, else the very little ones and the bashful ones are likely to drop out of the games and sports. Also, I learned that the children were given a reasonable time for roaming within bounds and for the exercise of individuality. The sustained merriment and good behavior of the children shattered my one adverse criticism, and convinced me that system is at the very root of your success.

"As for the rest, here is what I think: The Home entertains three hundred small children separate from their parents. Many of the children are very young. Some are shy. There is great responsibility to the parent. This responsibility is met fully by those in charge. The appreciation and affection evinced by the children is a most beautiful and touching feature. During my short visit, I myself made no end of 'slap-on-the-back' friendships. The children made me feel that I was quite acceptable and welcome to stay.

"The children are not decoyed into a visit of monotony, suggestive of charity. They make a bona fide visit of ten full days to a country home. The country itself is beautiful. The dormitories, kitchen, mess hall, and in fact all the conveniences are strikingly neat and attractive. The diet is wholesome and plentiful. It is served in an orderly way. The benefits of the Home stop short only at a luxury that might do more harm than good. Evidently your whole scheme is one of consistent balances. More than once I expressed to you my high opinion of the quality of your assistants and of the fine spirit in which they did their duties. As for yourself, my dear doctor, I must convict you of being a very abnormal man. If you were normal, you could not—or would not—add to your other labors so many hours of very active leadership in the games and sports of those children. Presumably, the love that the children give you so bountifully is your sustaining tonic. The children are the merriest lot of 'boomers' one could wish to see. Your repeated calls for 'A little more noise, children,' never once failed of response. The children go to the Home for a bracing good time and that they get. It was a happy thought that suggested the period of ten days. Lasting benefit, physical and mental, may come to a in that period.

"I talked to many of the children found that they tended to assume in tant rank according to the numbe years they had visited the Home. were of many creeds, and, by descen many nationalities; yet the aggreg was harmonious, as well as very Ame in patriotism. I think I have told what pleased me most. It was that visit to a dormitory of little girls, they had been tucked in for the n Each child had her own bed of spo neatness. All were smiling and ha for they had had a day of strenuous Seemingly, each one wished to be noti The young lady in charge called on t for a lullaby song. They sang it sweetly, and then gave us their 'g night' wishes as we left. The incident impressive and illustrated clearly the sentiment on which is based the help ness of the Children's Home. I giv you, my dear doctor, and to all the ot who made my visit so pleasant and in esting, my cordial thanks and good wis

NARCISSA'S BIRTHDAY PARTY

NARCISSA, when two years old, removed with her parents from their home in the heart of Manhattan Island to a beautiful colonial house on the banks of the Hudson. The new home seemed very wonderful to the little city girl, and after a few weeks Narcissa had made friends with the chickens, the cow, Popcorn (the pony), and the other animals about the place. It was all much more beautiful and interesting than the New York streets, or even Central Park, and Narcissa's mother often told her that she should be very happy to be living in the country while so many less fortunate children were obliged to remain in the hot, dirty city even in midsummer.

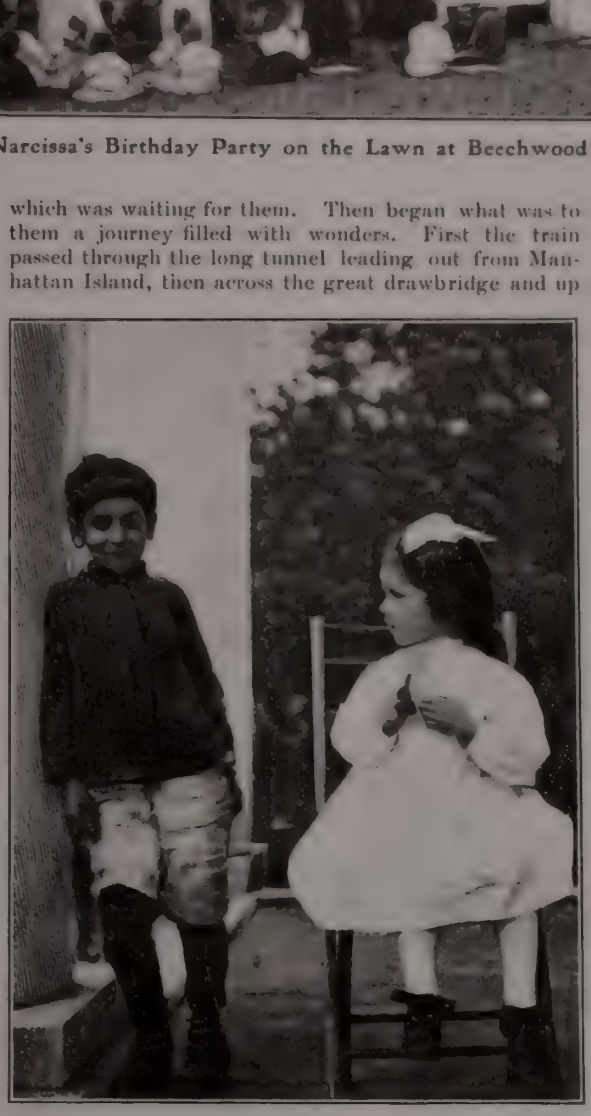
Narcissa's Birthday Party on the Lawn at Beechwood

Narcissa had now been in the country a year and it seemed to her that the broad green lawns, the brilliant gardens and the fine old trees at the home on the Hudson were never more wonderful than this summer. At the end of June came the day when Narcissa would be three years old and one morning she was asked by her mother how she would like to celebrate the anniversary. Her mother said that some children of the wealthy men having country estates in the neighborhood could be asked in for a party, but she thought it would be much better to invite some of the poor tenement children from New York, who would probably have no other opportunity during the summer to enjoy a day in the country.

Little Narcissa was delighted with the idea, and plans were set in motion for the great day. The mother communicated with the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and asked them if they knew of about thirty poor children who would like to attend Narcissa's party. The officers of the Association said that they knew of at least thirty thousand, and it would be no trouble at all to select thirty of the most deserving ones. Narcissa, however, thought that thirty children would make too small a party, so thirty-five others were invited from one of the settlement houses on the East Side.

At the house on the Hudson many plans were formed for the entertainment of the little tenement guests, and the tiny hostess could think of little else but her approaching birthday. In many stuffy tenements of the city equally important preparations were going on. Many a tired, worn-out mother was busy washing and ironing, to make ready her child's one best dress so that she would make a good appearance at the party.

When at last the birthday dawned, the sun was shining clear from the blue sky, and it was plain to be seen that the day in New York would be unusually hot. The little tenement children with the matrons in charge gathered at the meeting place in the Grand Central Station and marched in single file to the special car which was waiting for them. Then began what was to them a journey filled with wonders. First the train passed through the long tunnel leading out from Manhattan Island, then across the great drawbridge and up along the beautiful shores of the Hudson. Most of the tots had never before seen the great river, and they were filled with wonder and delight at the sight. The train arrived at Scarborough station, where Narcissa lives, and an automobile and carriages were waiting to carry the smaller children up the hill. The others were glad to walk, and in two or three minutes they were received by the little hostess on the wide veranda at "Beechwood." The guests were told that the entire estate of seventy acres was theirs to run over and enjoy as they wished, and it was soon seen that very little entertaining would be necessary.



The Little Hostess Entertains a Guest

Who can describe the feelings of the children from six to ten years of age, who had spent their entire lives in crowded tenements, when they were turned loose in grounds which for years had been beautified by all the art of the landscape gardener and the horticulturist? The boys and girls ran hither and thither, over the smooth lawns, under the trees and among the flowers. They explored the wonders of the poultry house, where the scores of little chickens excited their glee and admiration.

They visited the stables, the lily pond and the rippling brook. Within an hour they had discovered more curious things than they had ever imagined the world contained.

On the lawn there was music, and games were arranged for those who wished to play. From time to time the automobile made trips about the neighborhood filled with as many children as could climb in, and it seemed to the city-bred youngsters that Beechwood must indeed be fairyland. Soon after noon a bountiful lunch was served under the trees and afterward the fun began again.

All the long afternoon the children played and romped and not a moment was wasted. At five o'clock the train was in waiting to take them home, and when they had reluctantly said good-by to little Narcissa, they marched down the hill and were soon on their way to New York.

Narcissa enjoyed the day as much as any of the city waifs. She had never before seen so many children together, and she thought it would be fun to have sixty-five playmates at Beechwood all the time. She seemed to be sensible of her duties as hostess, and was equally kind and gracious to all the guests. When the long day was over, and she was ready for bed in the nursery, Narcissa told her mother that this was the best day she had ever had and that no birthday party was ever so nice before. Although only three, little Narcissa had learned that it was more blessed to give than to receive. The pleasure of the tenement children was a greater joy to her than any gift she could have received.

ancient people of God were forbidden to enter the most holy place in person. The High Priest, as their representative, entered for them to sprinkle the mercy-seat with blood on the great day of atonement, while they must stand at a distance. But Christ by his atoning death and vicarious sacrifice has opened the way through which every penitent and believing sinner may have free access to the mercy-seat. He is himself "the way." We need no longer fear to approach into the very presence of Jehovah. Though we are sinners, and as a just and holy God; though we are conscious of ill-desert, and burdened with a sense of guilt, if we draw near to him, through Christ, we shall be accepted.

Nor are these precious privileges, symbolized in the rent veil, confined to the seed of Abraham according to the flesh. They are available to the whole world of mankind. The apostle Paul, in writing to the Ephesian converts, says: "He is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us." The apostle here alludes to the partition in the temple enclosure, which separated the Court of the Gentiles from the interior courts into which Jews only had liberty to enter. And as the breaking down of this partition wall permits a nearer approach for the Gentiles, so also are they permitted to pass through the rent veil into the immediate presence of a reconciled God. Ah, yes! it is a blessed truth that, through the atoning sacrifice of Christ, all are welcome who come pleading the merits and atonement of Christ; all, all are accepted, who come trusting in the blood and righteousness of Jesus. Would that we might more and more realize that there need be no barrier between our souls and the mercy-seat! "Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us through the veil, that is to say, his flesh, let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith."

Thus approaching the mercy-seat, with humble faith and holy boldness, we shall "obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need." And at last we shall be admitted into the Holy of Holies, in the great sanctuary above, the temple not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

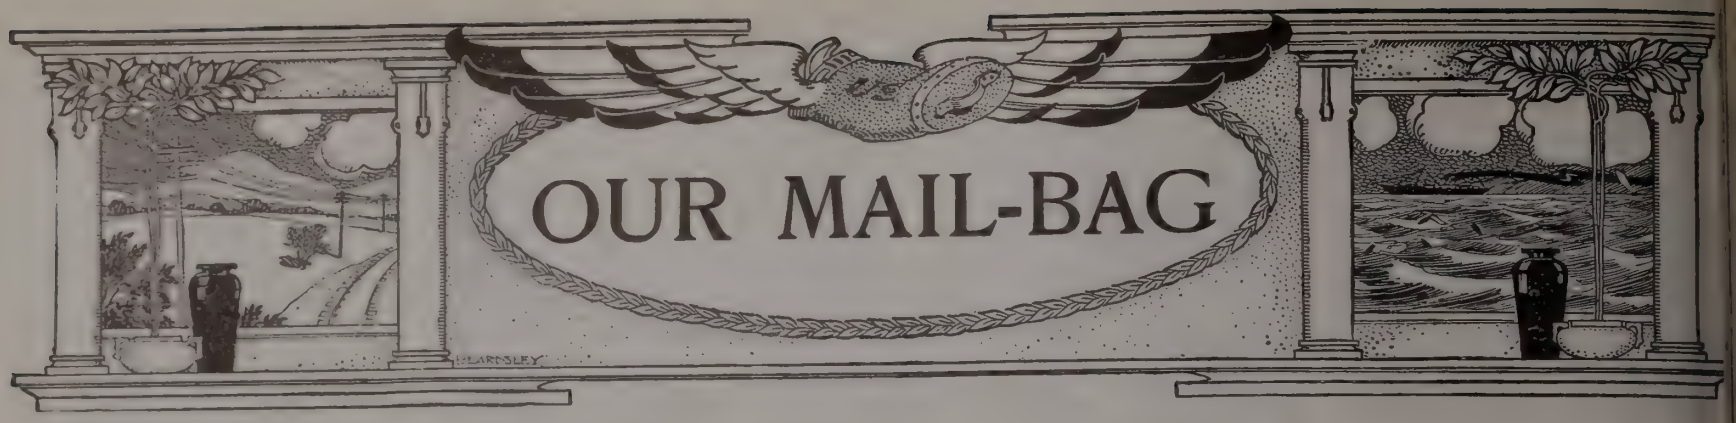
Rev. Henry Barton Chapin, author of the foregoing sermon, was born September 14, 1827. He studied theology in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, and in Princeton Theological Seminary. On October 29, 1854, he was ordained by the Presbytery of New York. After this he was engaged in ministerial work for twelve years in New York, Steubenville, O., and Trenton, N. J. From 1854 to 1856 he was city missionary in New York in connection with the University Place Presbyterian Church. From 1856 to 1858 he was pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Steubenville, O. From 1858 to 1866 he was pastor of the Third Presbyterian Church, Trenton, N. J. Since 1900, he has been chaplain of the Presbyterian Home, New York City. In 1903, he retired from the principalship of the Chapin Collegiate School after a service of thirty-six years. During the past forty years, in addition to school work, he has frequently supplied the pulpits of churches in New York and its vicinity. Dr. Chapin has been Recording Secretary of the United States Evangelical Alliance since 1871 and was delegate to the Jubilee Conference of the World's Evangelical Alliance in London in 1896. Since 1884, he has been chaplain of the Society of the Cincinnati in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, of which society he is hereditary member as the lineal representative of his great-grandfather, Col. William Barton, an officer of the Rhode Island Continental line in the Revolutionary War. He received the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy in 1868 and Doctor of Divinity in 1891, both from Princeton University.

Bitlis Sufferers Grateful

"THE sufferers of the severe earthquake at this distant point," writes the Rev. R. M. Cole, "send greetings and most sincere thanks for your kind remittal for poor suffering humanity here. It is just like the enterprising, wide-awake CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers to lead all others in such humanitarian enterprises.

"We and the Germans, with our combined funds, have been relieving over 3,000 persons, till now the Gregorian Prelacy people are moving slowly.

"None save those entering such a work here can realize the difficulties that exist from wrong-dealing and deception on every hand. Miss Ely, with her orphan girls and teachers, and our German friends, Mr. and Mrs. Von Bobbeler, have greatly aided the relief work, so that the city was surprised to see so many provided with bread so soon, we having made the first move when only THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S gift had arrived from New York City. Heaven bless all the kind donors to this noble enterprise!"



Questions and Answers

We regret to learn that, owing to rapidly failing eyesight (he is now in his eighty-seventh year), Professor Lewis Swift, of Marathon, N. Y., will no longer be able to answer astronomical questions asked in THE MAIL-BAG. Our readers, too, will sincerely regret this, and they will sympathize with Professor Swift in his affliction. For several years they have enjoyed the valuable aid supplied by his wonderful store of knowledge and his wide scientific experience. The distinguished astronomer has well earned the love and gratitude of many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Sunday School Teacher, Philadelphia, Pa. I have to give an address shortly on the journeys of the Israelites. Could you supply me with an enlarged copy of the cut of the Tabernacle which you published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on July 24?

You can obtain a fine lithograph of it, four feet by three, from the designer, Mr. W. E. Stephens, 83 Rugby Road, New York, Brooklyn Borough. It is beautifully printed in ten shades, with cloth back and mounted on rollers, and is suitable for lecture purposes or for the wall of a Sunday School room. Price $3, including express charges.

A. R. R., Lowell, Mich. Who were the Nicolaitans, mentioned in Rev. 2: 6 and other passages?

They appear to have been a sect of Antinomians who, without authority, took on themselves the name of Nicolas, the proselyte mentioned in Acts 6: 5, as being made a deacon. He probably uttered some words which were perverted by licentious men, who thereafterwards called themselves after him. They practically taught that men might live as they chose, while professing to be Christians, and that even drunkenness and adultery were permissible under the Christian law of liberty.

C. R. B., Lamerton, Canada. Where is Israel, the northern kingdom, which is to be restored to Palestine with Judah?

It is supposed to be absorbed in other nations. Many prophetic students contend that the Anglo-Saxon race is derived from those ten tribes, and many learned writers have issued elaborate arguments in proof. Hebrews have been found in China and many other lands, who apparently do not belong to Judah. But Israel probably lost its identity through intermarriage.

F. D., St. Genevieve, Mo. Explain the meaning of "morganatic" as applied to marriage.

A "morganatic" marriage is the union of a man of royal rank to a woman of inferior degree, whose children are legitimate, but cannot inherit the father's titles, rank or estates.

I. J. M., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Can any of your readers furnish the facts concerning the "Bible courtship" of Nicholas Rousselet?

The story is preserved in connection with St. John's Church, Portsmouth, N. H. Nicholas Rousselet, while attending services there, marked several passages in his Bible and handed the book to Miss Catherine Moffatt. The story, as related by a recent chronicler, goes on to tell how one day he marked the first verse of the Second Epistle of St. John. Miss Catherine read, "Unto the elect lady." And then, in the fifth verse, "And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another." Miss Moffatt marked the first chapter of Ruth, verses 16 and 17.

Frank H. Vizetelly, New York, writes:

Permit me to make an addition to your reply to your "Inquirer" of Cincinnati, O., in the MAIL-BAG Department of July 17. It concerns the relative number of words in the vocabularies of the different dictionaries published. The publishers of the Century Dictionary claim only 225,000 words for their work. The Funk & Wagnalls Company's Standard Dictionary contains 317,000, all of which were selected with great care before they were included in its vocabulary. If a comparison were made on the basis of living, usable words, it would be found that the vocabulary of the Standard Dictionary would exceed that of all other dictionaries of the English language combined by not less than 100,000 words.

M. N., Canada. Where and when did the giving of toasts originate? Do you consider it right for Christians to toast even in water?

The custom of "toasting" or drinking healths is very ancient. Indications of its existence are found in Greek and Roman literature before the Christian era. In Europe, owing to the spread of drinking and convivial habits generally, the custom found a foothold in the seventeenth century. Christian people in our day practically reject the custom altogether.

We have been almost overwhelmed with answers giving solutions of the two Scripture puzzles—the first ("The Whale that Swallowed Jonah") having brought hundreds of replies, and the second ("Silence," Rev. 8: 1), having brought also a very great number. Space prevents the printing of all the names. The honors of first solution in No. 1 belongs to H. S., State Hill, Pa., and in No. 2 to Mrs. Rachel V., Horton, Kan.

As many of our readers seem to like these Bible riddles, we give another, forwarded by Miss Annie M., Grafton, Mass.:

What character in the Bible, whose name is never mentioned; whose body never saw corruption; whose death was like no other person's; whose winding sheet is in every household; who was condemned for what brought renown to a recent author?

The solution and the name of the person sending the first correct answer will be published in THE MAIL-BAG.

A. S. P., Palmyra, N. Y. The writer has a vivid recollection that, as a boy, there was visible for several weeks a very brilliant comet, the tail of which extended nearly half way across the horizon. Will you kindly inform me as to the exact date, name, length of time it was visible, and when it will be seen again?

I too have a vivid recollection of the comet, for in some respects it surpassed all that have appeared in modern times. When I first saw it, it was below the western horizon, but its tail extended beyond the zenith. When in perihelion (nearest the sun), it passed nearer to it than any known heavenly body; 50,000 miles of its surface was visible by daylight. This comet appeared in 1843. When nearest the sun it moved at the astonishing rate of 1,000,000 miles an hour, or forty times round the earth during the time an express train would move forty miles. When neares the sun it must have revolved half roun in a few hours; but to revolve the ot half would take somewhere between and 600 years. As its tail was nea 100,000,000 miles long, how swiftly m its end have moved during its few hou sweep in going half round the sun!

PORTLAND'S ROSE SHOW

PORTLAND, Ore., vying with the cities of California, has held its first floral festival. Portland has long been called the "rose city" from the beauty and abundance of its roses. These were made the special feature of the fiesta. The affair lasted two days, and it is doubtful if there has ever been seen such a collection of flowers used in decoration. The school children's parade was on the first day. One of its features was a battalion of young girls carrying large bouquets of roses. In the parade of the second day were many automobiles so covered with blooms that they appeared to be made of flowers, not a bit of wood or metal being visible.

PREVENTABLE PERILS OF YOUTH

These young men, who should given the people an example of dience, were made an example of God's punishment of disobedience. How d they so foolishly, as well as wickedly, careers that would have led to highest r and usefulness? The answer is in the l God puts on the story, showing plainly it was wine that made them wreck lives. He said to Aaron after the dy: "Drink no wine nor strong drink, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go the tabernacle." Alas! that is the al of many a home tragedy in our day, might have been prevented if heed been given to the warning of our den Text: "Wine is a mocker, strong k is raging: and whosoever is deceived eby is not wise."

e story and the Golden Text suggest following topics: 1. Intoxicants lead acrilege. 2. Intoxicants make men s. 3. Intoxicants sadden the home.

That "rum and religion won't mix" the emphatic testimony of the man- of the famous "Subway Saloon" of York City, which was opened by who argued that the best way to fight d saloons" was by substituting a "good on," where men would be urged to k only in moderation. But all who are abreast the latest scientific studies of alcohol w that it inflames evil passions wher- r and by whomsoever sold. The spirit- is is the opposite of the spiritual. "Be overcome of wine, but be filled with Spirit." "Liquor is the devil's way a man, and a man's way to the devil."

Alcohol Excluded from Church

he supreme lesson of this story of ng priests ruined by drink is that alco- has no business inside the church, ether in pulpit or pew. The churches st advanced on the temperance ques- n not only exclude liquor dealers from mbership, but require abstinence of achers and members. Other churches short of this, but the advances are all that direction. Surely no Christian has ight to do what if all the world followed example, as some are sure to do, would duce more harm than good. A wine ss in a pulpit is "strange fire" indeed. w churches would tolerate it. But how it any better for the preacher to drink banquets or at his own table? And rely no Christian has a right to do what would not like to see his preacher do. Abstain from every form of evil" is the ine order for us all.

International Sunday School Lesson for August , 1907. Nadab and Abihu. A Temperance sson. Lev. 10: 1-11. GOLDEN TEXT: "Wine is nocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever deceived thereby is not wise." Prov. 20: 1.

2. The folly of Nadab and Abihu (due partly to wine, no doubt) was a match for their wickedness. The use of intoxicants by young men to-day is yet more foolish, for fifty-one per cent. of the employers in the United States discriminate in favor of employees who keep the fuddling alcohol away from their brains. Julia Colman, in the Independent for March 22, 1894, gives numerous instances where auctioneers and salesmen, by dosing prospective purchasers with wine or beer, have led them to offer many times the value of the goods. In one instance, when standing timber was to be sold by auction, the Christian proprietor ordered the auctioneer to dispense no liquors. The auctioneer replied: "I am sorry, for you will lose a great deal of money. I know how it works. When men have been drinking the trees look much larger. It reminds us of the custom in China to order one scale to sell by and another by which to buy. No less unjust is the man who uses drink to increase his selling price; no less foolish the buyer who accepts drink when it is so manifestly at his own cost.

"There went out fire from the Lord and devoured them"

Moderation Injurious

When a young man's life is cut off suddenly by drink in some tragedy, as in the story we are considering, we are startled; but why are young men so indifferent to the voice of science which, in every insurance examination, proclaims emphatically that even the most moderate tippling shortens life? Half a century's experience in classifying abstainers and moderate drinkers separately in British companies shows that an abstaining young man averages twenty to thirty per cent. longer duration of life than even those very moderate drinkers who are able to get insurance. Insurance presidents testify to remarkable mortality, not only of whiskey drinkers, but also of the beer drinkers who are often regarded by superficial friends as "the very pictures of health."

Athletics also teach abstinence. In the course of a speech in 1904 Lord Charles Beresford, the great British admiral, said: "When I was a young man I was an athlete. I used to box a great deal, ride steeplechases and races, play football and go through a number of competitive sports and pastimes. When I put myself into training, which was a continual occurrence, I never drank any wine, spirits or beer at all, for the simple reason that I felt I could get fit quicker without taking any stimulants. Now I am an older man, and have especially among the child races; for which reason temperance and missions are very closely related. History, out of abundant sorrows and tragedies, has proved that alcohol is:

1. A Mocker, saying "Good cheer," but leading men to the lockup.
2. A Cheat, receiving much value, but returning none.
3. A Liar, promising to warm and strengthen, but doing neither.
4. A Thief, robbing the till of every honest merchant.
5. A Bandit, despoiling laborers on their way home from toil.
6. A Debaucher, whose haunt is hung with obscene pictures.
7. A Corrupter, making men worse, but never better.
8. A Disturber, causing contention, accidents and general disorder.
9. A Kidnapper, stealing boys from the home and enslaving free men.
10. A Ravager, whose wounded fill asylums, hospitals and almshouses.
11. A Poisoner, whose victims die in dreadful delirium.
12. A Murderer—alias Eau-de-vie—who deals out death.
13. A Tyrant, ruling by bribery and the help of shameless allies.
14. An Anarchist, who daily defies the law of the State.
15. A Traitor, pretending to enrich the nation, but working its ruin.

Such an indictment calls for a sentence of banishment. At least let every man make a prohibitory law for his own mouth to guard his brain.

When President Lincoln visited General Grant's camp at City Point, Va., in 1864, he was met by the general and his staff, and upon being asked how he was, he said, "I am not feeling very well. I got pretty badly shaken up on the bay coming down, and am not altogether over it yet." "Let me send for a bottle of champagne for you, Mr. President," said one of the staff officers; "that's the best remedy I know of for seasickness." "No, no, my young friend," said Mr. Lincoln, "I have seen many a man in my time seasick on shore from drinking that very article."

3. Who can measure the sorrow of Aaron and his wife at the death of their sons? If these sons had died in the path of duty, it would have been sad enough; but when the sons of good parents die in disgraceful sin, that is sorrow upon sorrow. Such sorrows, which parents can speak of only to God, and which put a perpetual shadow into homes that should be centres of light and joy, come from youth's tampering with liquors more than from all things else.

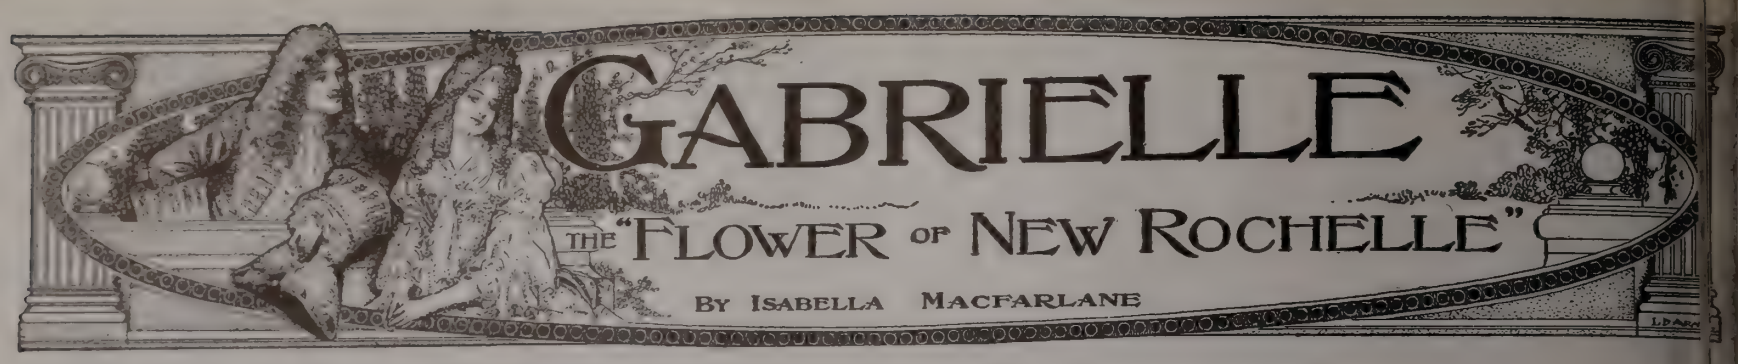
Lessening Temptation

Surely it is the duty of us all to "make it easier to do right and harder to do wrong" for tempted boys and for men trying to reform. That is the purpose of law. No one expects that all buying of intoxicants would suddenly cease, no matter what laws were passed, but we can at least close bars and saloons where men loaf and treat and plot every evil work. It is not so much the man who will buy the drink anyway that we expect to restrain by prohibitory laws, as the man who makes it his business, by opening an attractive bar, to induce the young and the weak, who would not otherwise drink, or would drink but seldom, to squander their money and health and ruin their lives for his enrichment.

In a report of the New York City Mission, a story is told of a poor woman who stood one Sunday evening looking from her window in the fifth story of a tenement house, down into the dark court below. She was a drunkard's wife, and she had gone to the window with the half-formed purpose of throwing herself out to end her wretched existence. The children, clinging to her skirts, were all that prevented her from carrying out her intention. Suddenly a cross of fire seemed to spring out of the dark sky. "It is a vision of hope, the voice of God!" she exclaimed. She pointed it out to her children. And through the long evening the miserable little group sat watching the fiery symbol of God's redeeming love standing out against the black sky. On inquiry, she learned the next morning that it was the cross crowning the steeple of a city mission church. There she went the next Sunday night and found the Saviour. Soon after her imbruted husband was converted, and they are now living the new life.

The Two Helps

"Every boy and man who desires to keep from drink needs the help of the Gospel also." "Well, it shan't happen again," said Will Black to his Christian wife. "I'm afraid it will, dear," replied Mrs. Black, "unless you seek the help of God." Will, for the first time in his life, had returned home slightly intoxicated the previous night. "I couldn't help it," said Will. "It was our annual dinner, and I took more than I ought before I knew what I was doing." "Dear Will," said Mrs. Black, "I don't want to be hard on you. You've been a good husband to me so far. But, oh! I do wish you were a Christian. Besides, we can help it. God has given us helps so that we can resist sin." "Indeed," replied Will," his eyes on his paper and pretending not to listen. "Yes, Will, dear. People go wrong because they don't use God's helps." "And what are they?" asked Will, a little more interested. "The first help is a Guide-book to show us the right way and the wrong way, and where they each lead to. If anybody uses that help he cannot make any mistake as to the way." "And what's the second?" asked Mr. Black, anxious to get it over, and at the same time more moved and impressed than he cared to confess. "Well, the second help, Will, dear, is more difficult to explain. But it's just the little voice inside us which says 'No, no, no!' and 'Yes, yes, yes!' It is conscience. Don't you think we ought to keep straight with these helps, Will, and that we can help going wrong?" "I suppose you're right, Sally," replied Mr. Black. He took his wife's advice, and by God's help reformed.



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but leaves a note on the fly-leaf of a psalm book explaining his plight.

CHAPTER VI

The Crowning of the Rosière

MEANTIME, Gabrielle, all unconscious of what was impending over her, was enjoying her visit with her cousins in the little town whither her doting father had sent her to be out of harm's way—undisturbed except by some vague fears connected with the presence of the soldiers in her father's house.

For although the country town in which Madame Bertrand had her residence was within twenty miles of La Rochelle, it was entirely out of the whirl and tumult, the trials, perils, and persecutions to which the latter place was exposed. For its population, belonging chiefly to the peasantry, had remained true to the faith of their fathers, and consequently there was no room for opposition.

The little stone church, with its cross-crowned steeple and ever-open door, was under the care of a good old curé, who never troubled his head with theological discussions, but in his own simple routine christened the children, married the young people, heard confessions, and buried the dead—for, as has been said, there was scarcely a member of "the Religion" in his parish.

The home of Madame Bertrand was a long, low cottage of one story, with stuccoed walls and red-tiled roof, as were most of the other houses in the place. In front of it was a pretty garden, in which flowers bloomed the whole year through.

At one side of it stood a colombier, or dove-cot, in the form of a small stone tower with openings in the roof, around which a numerous flock of white and gray-blue pigeons fluttered and cooed and strutted, and preened their feathers, and attended assiduously to their family cares.

Fields of wheat and flax lay around the village, in which both men and women toiled, and here and there great windmills stretched out their arms to catch the passing breeze.

Gabrielle was a beautiful girl. It was not the mere beauty of form and feature, though those she possessed in an eminent degree, that gave the charm. It was the reflection of the inner light—"the hidden man of the heart"—that shone forth in the speaking eye, the beaming smile, the softly modulated voice, and the hand ever ready to help. Yet Gabrielle was not all softness. She was endowed with great force of character, which, in the troublous times in which she lived, was to stand her in good stead. Her complexion was fair, and her hair a soft brown—traits derived from her Celtic ancestry, for her mother was a native of Brittany. In stature she was somewhat above the middle height, and she possessed a native grace of carriage that was not the least of her attractions.

The cousins, both mother and daughter, were delighted to have her with them, and tried to make her sojourn with them as pleasant as they could.

"I am glad," said Rosalie to her one day, "that you happened to come to us just at this time, for next week the Crowning of the "Rosière" will take place, and that is always interesting."

"What is that?"

"Do you not know?" said Rosalie, surprised.

"Your cousin does not know," said her mother, "because she has always lived in the city, and the "Rosière" is a rural institution. It is an institution intended to promote industry, piety, and all the Christian virtues among the peasant girls, and she who is adjudged the best-behaved girl in the parish is publicly crowned by the mayor with a crown of roses, and is dignified with the title of "La Rosière" for that year.

"Oh, that is beautiful!" said Gabrielle. "I shall be delighted to see it."

"The winner of the prize for this year is a young woman named Claire Duval, who has, by labor in the fields—pulling flax, reaping wheat with a sickle, binding sheaves, and such things, supported herself and her blind father. As the wages are low she has had to work very hard. Rosalie is helping her to make the white gown she is to wear on the occasion, for she has neither time nor skill to do it herself."

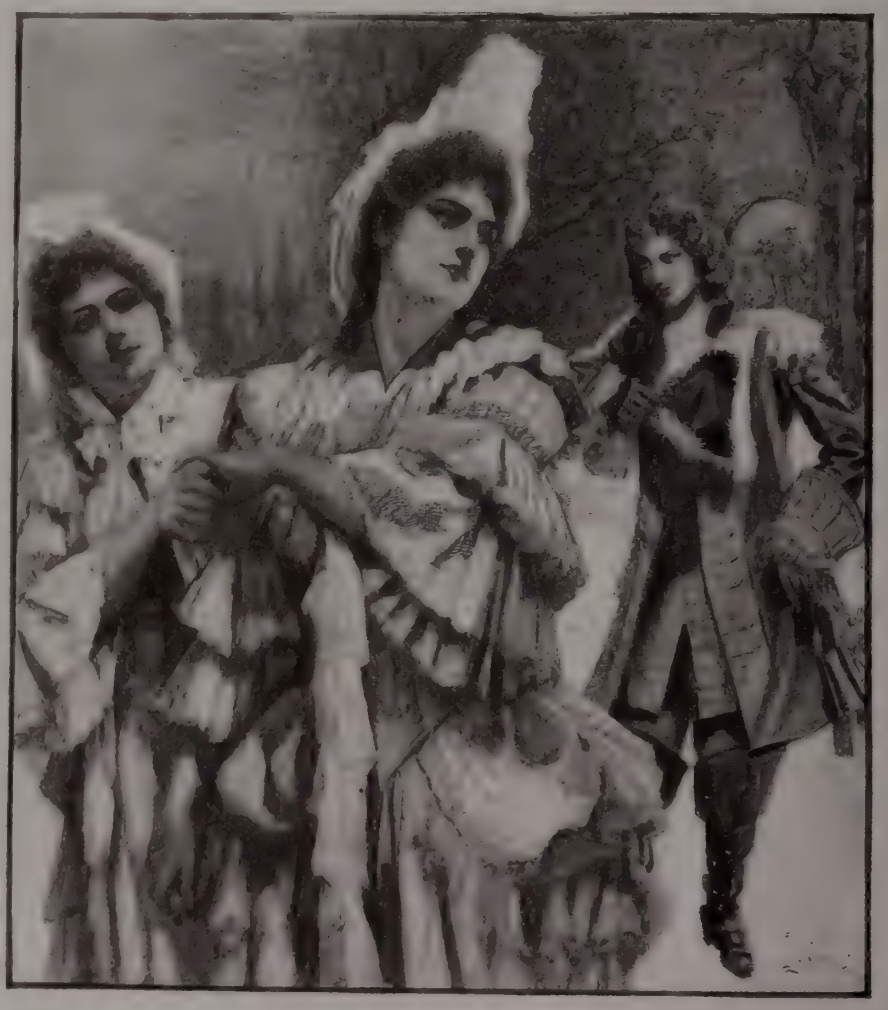
"Let me help also," said Gabrielle. "I shall be glad to do so."

The residence of the mayor was a handsome château, situated just beyond the confines of the town, and surrounded by extensive and well-kept grounds. In these grounds, thrown open for the day to the public, the ceremony was to be held.

Thither, on the day appointed, nearly the whole population resorted, among whom were the two cousins, Gabrielle and Rosalie; Madame Pauline, who had seen it often, remaining at home. Even the blind father of the girl was there, for though he could not witness the ceremony, he could hear the commendations of the mayor, and the congratulations of friends.

Among the spectators appeared the old curé, in his black cassock and three-cornered hat, well pleased to see that one whom he had baptized and catechized had turned out so well.

On a handsome settee placed on the gravel walk, the mayor and mayoress took their seats, attired as if for some grand social function—the lady in a low-necked, short-sleeved gown of pink velvet, lace-trimmed, with long white gloves and jeweled necklace, and a red rose in her hair; the mayor in his official costume—blue coat well garnished with gold lace, white small-clothes, white silk stockings and low shoes, with sword and gold epaulets.



"There was nothing terrible in the aspect of Captain Girard as he smilingly approached———"

Two servants in scarlet and yellow livery stood behind them. At a sign from the mayor, one of these entered the mansion, and brought forth a cushion of crimson plush, which he laid on the ground in front of the mayor and mayoress.

The other servant, also entering the house, returned with a look of importance, bearing in his hands the rose crown.

The mayor, bare-headed, arose from his seat, and taking a step or two forward, made a sign for the candidate to approach.

Blushing and trembling, the young woman advanced, and at another sign, knelt on the crimson cushion [illegible] clasped hands and downcast eyes. [illegible] wore the white gown on which [illegible] cousins had set many a careful s[illegible] her hair neatly and simply arrange[illegible]

The mayor, taking the chaplet [illegible] the hands of the lackey, said, in a [illegible] clear voice that all might hear:

"Claire Duval, in acknowledgme[illegible] of the many good qualities of which [illegible] have shown yourself possessed, you [illegible] been adjudged worthy to bear the [illegible] of "La Rosière," and to receive [illegible] crown of roses, which I here plac[illegible] your head."

He stretched out his hands, and h[illegible] ing over the kneeling figure, set [illegible] chaplet on her head.

The crown or chaplet was not a [illegible] garland of perishable roses, but a c[illegible] of wire, artistically formed, and [illegible] round with artificial white roses—s[illegible] thing that could be kept as an heirl[illegible] and handed down to the children [illegible] grandchildren of the happy "Rosière[illegible]

It is impossible to describe the joy [illegible] delight of the peasant girl, as she [illegible] led away in triumph by her frie[illegible] She shed tears of joy, she laughed, [illegible] embraced her blind father, kissing [illegible] rapturously on both cheeks, and [illegible] lamenting that he could not see [illegible] trophy, won by self-denial and [illegible] labor.

Her feelings are best described [illegible] couple of verses appended to a pic[illegible] of the pretty ceremonial in the wri[illegible]'s possession:

Quand sage elle a vécu,
Sa récompense est plénière,
Et ce n'est que pour sa vertu
Qu'elle est couronnée Rosière.

Qu'il est grand ce moment heureu[illegible]
Pour elle quelle jouissance!
A jamais sont comblés ses vœux,
Elle est toute à la reconnaissance!

The ceremony over, subdued c[illegible] arose of "Vive Monsieur le Maire!" "[illegible] la Rosière!"—in the midst of which [illegible] mayor offered his arm to his lady, [illegible] the two re-entered the house, the [illegible] vants picking up the crimson cush[illegible], and removing the settee.

As the crowd was dispersing, Gabri[illegible] noticed on the extreme edge of it a g[illegible] of gold lace and the curve of a co[illegible] hat, which gradually developed into [illegible] uniform and head-piece of an officer [illegible] the king's dragoons, while outside [illegible] gate sat a mounted orderly, holding [illegible] officer's horse.

"Oh!" she cried in dismay, "have t[illegible] terrible dragoons come here also?"

But there was nothing terrible in [illegible] aspect of Captain Girard—for it [illegible] he—as he smilingly approached [illegible] saluted the two girls.

"You see, fair runaway," said he, [illegible] ing his eyes on Gabrielle's face, "I h[illegible] found you!"

"Sir," said Gabrielle, haughtily, "w[illegible] right have you to address me so fa[illegible] iarly? I do not know you—I never s[illegible] you before, but once."

"And I never saw you but o[illegible]. Mademoiselle, but that once was eno[illegible] to lure me on a twenty-mile ride, t[illegible] I might see you again."

By this time they were out of the [illegible] closure, and wending their way [illegible] Madame Bertrand's cottage, Gira[illegible] without asking permission, accompa[illegible] ing them—the orderly following at [illegible] little distance.

CHAPTER VII

Evil Tidings

IT was on the very day after this pretty rural festival, with its gay and innocent associations, that David de Bonnefoy, sad and heavy-hearted, set out on horseback for that same town, to convey to his daughter the mournful intelligence of the fate that had befallen her lover.

Gabrielle was seated in the latticed porch of the cottage, with its climbing vines and clusters of flowers, engaged on a piece of needlework. Forbidden to sing the "Songs of Zion" in Marot's French translation, lest they should "corrupt" and "disturb" the faithful, she was crooning to herself one of the quaint folk-songs of Brittany, which her mother had taught her, when she saw her father dismounting at the gate.

Throwing down her work, she flew to meet him, and flung herself into his arms.

"Oh, father! how glad I am to see you. Oh, how I have longed for you!"

"Let me tie my horse, dear, and then I shall talk with you," said David, in a voice so grave that she knew something was wrong.

"Oh, father, what is it? What has happened? Is my mother—is grandmother—have the soldiers –"

"No, my love, they are all well," he answered, chokingly.

Then having tied his horse to a post, while she stood pale and trembling, he took her in his arms again, and strained her to his breast, utterly unable to speak.

"Oh, my child! How can I tell you?"

Some intuition told her the truth.

"Is it Louis, father?" she whispered.

"Yes, darling, it is Louis."

A convulsive shiver passed over her frame.

"Is he dead?" she breathed.

"No, dear, he is not dead. But let me carry you to a seat, and I will tell you what has happened."

Placing her on the bench in the little veranda, he seated himself by her side.

"Are you strong in faith, my child? Can you say, with the old prophet, 'It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good'?"

"Yes, father, I shall try."

But she was not so strong as she thought she was; for when he drew from his breast the psalm-book on which Louis had written his parting message, she uttered a shriek that rang through the house, and brought Pauline and Rosalie running to learn what had happened.

Then the two women, in true heart sympathy, mingled their tears and lamentations with hers.

"Oh," said Pauline, "why do people do such things? Why should they tear each other like wild beasts? Are we not all the children of the same good Father, though we may differ somewhat in the way we worship him?"

When Gabrielle's grief had calmed somewhat, she begged to know every particular of her lover's arrest.

"We do not fully know the particulars," said her father. "Louis was alone in the house, when, in the midst of a tempest of wind and rain, his father came to the door, half dead with cold and hunger, and begged for shelter and food. Louis took him in and hid him in the attic. The old man fell asleep, and knew nothing more until the next day—that is, yesterday—when he found Louis gone, and those fatal words on the table. We can only conjecture that the soldiers had come in the night, and Louis, to save his father, had personated him, using an old clerical coat which has also disappeared, and had gone to the doom intended for his father."

"Oh, how brave! how noble!" said Gabrielle, clasping her hands. "It was just like my Louis to do this!"

SINCE BIRTH

BABY HUNTER. WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mrs. Hunter, wife of Dr. M. Hunter, 2808 N St., N. W., Washington, D. C., writes as follows:

Dear Sirs:

Our baby has been reared on Eskay's Food exclusively, and is now 16 months of age, is perfectly strong, never having had an hour's sickness since birth. She walked at ten months, and talks as well as most children twice her age. Doctor attributes it all to your incomparable food. We can not praise Eskay's enough, and Doctor orders it for all cases where nature fails to provide proper sustenance.

Again thanking you very kindly for Doctor and myself, I am most truly,

MRS. M. HUNTER.

PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

In every country where the sons of Italy have made their home, they have been celebrating this month the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Giuseppe Garibaldi, the "liberator" and one of the builders of modern Italy. His wonderful achievements as a soldier and a statesman for his native soil are well known to the readers of history, but the facts that his first campaigns were made in South America, and that he made his home for a while on Staten Island, New York City, are not so generally known.

President Fallieres

Garibaldi was born in Nice. He crossed the Atlantic when but a mere lad and served his first campaign as a private in the province of Rio Grande, in Brazil. It was during one of the sporadic insurrections that have afflicted that country since the days of Portuguese rule. Garibaldi next transferred his activities to Montevideo, and in this distinguished himself by fighting against the "tyrant of Buenos Ayres."

Italy began to join the general unrest that marked the year 1848, and Garibaldi returned home. Italy, it must be remembered, was then but a collection of small principalities, and a prey to invaders. Garibaldi fought his way across the plains of Lombardy, and with a handful of followers held Rome for three months against the troops of France, Austria and Naples that were sent to restore the temporal power of the Pope. The odds were too great and Garibaldi retired. His wife died from privation during the retreat. Garibaldi escaped to America and became the captain of a coastwise vessel. He made his home on Staten Island, and a few days ago the Italian societies of New York assembled there to dedicate the imposing Pantheon which has been built over the humble structure in which the patriot lived. The house can be seen between the pillars that support the roof. Leaving New York, he went to the island of Caprera, near Italy. Then came the war of 1859. Garibaldi wrested Sicily from the King of Naples, occupied Naples, and was proclaimed dictator. He readily acquiesced in the annexation of the Two Sicilies to Italy. When Italy became a united kingdom, with Rome as its capital, he took his seat as a member of Parliament. He lived the rest of his life in retirement at Caprera, where he died in 1882. What he accomplished together with King Victor Emanuel, is told in the Italian manifesto issued in London: "To-day the Italian flag floats proudly over the Capitol, awakening memories of the past glories of Rome, and the tri-color, encircling the cross of Savoy, has become the symbol of free and United Italy, and will serve as a stimulus urging on to fresh glories in the arts of peace."

THE FRENCH PEOPLE have been greatly stirred by the attempt made on the life of President Fallieres by an anarchist. The president was returning from a grand review held at Longchamps to commemorate the fall of the Bastile. The streets were densely packed with cheering crowds. As the carriage was going down the Champs Elysees, the would-be assassin stepped from the crowd, drew a pistol and fired point blank at the president. The shots went wild. The next instant two soldiers jumped on the desperado and bore him to the ground. The crowd tried to get at him but were held back by the police. The president seemed unmoved by his narrow escape.

Thousands Prostrated

ON July 18 thousands of Elks met in Philadelphia for their conclave and parade. People from far and near swarmed into the city and packed themselves along the line of march. Few had any premonition, though the day was hot, of what would happen in a few hours under the sun's rays. Marchers and onlookers were affected with sunstroke. Broad Street looked like a battlefield. Hospitals were improvised, and the stricken were laid in rows on the grass. When the victims were falling thickest, the music of the parade was almost drowned by the clang of ambulance gongs. Doctors with red crosses on their arms were dashing water on the fainting men and women. Men stationed with megaphones at telephones attached to poles above the street were shouting: "Send two wagons to Broad and Greene Streets," or "Thirty-eight people fallen in the crowd at Clerks Street," and directions as to what hospitals could take any more victims.

The hospitals were soon swamped with patients. There were 4,380 recorded cases of prostration, and probably as many more were treated and sent home. A shower came up and stopped the sun's havoc, otherwise, the doctors say, if the heat had lasted an hour longer, the victims would have been numbered by the tens of thousands, and the death list appalling.

Enduring Persecution*

READING anew passages from the history of the reign of Queen Mary in England and some of the records of the Spanish Inquisition and the still earlier history of ancient Rome, it seems astonishing that Christianity was not extinguished by those horrors. When the mere fact that a man attended a Gospel meeting or believed in the forbidden doctrines was sufficient to cause him to be sent to prison, to be tortured with fiendish ingenuity, it seems wonderful what courage the Christians of those days must have had. Yet many of them were physically weak, some of them delicate women whose bodily powers were of the feeblest. So it was in India during the mutiny and in China during the "Boxer" outbreak. The quick alternative was over and over again set before a prisoner of abjuring Christ or dying a violent death. When we remember what death means in a household, how anxious we are for the doctor's arrival; how intently we watch his face to learn if there is hope of life: how eager we are to minister to the sick, and how intently we watch the struggle for life—it is amazing that when death might be warded off by a word that word should not be spoken. It shows that, as Christ said, there are things dearer than life.

It is significant that persecution always fails. The persecutors have power, but after they have killed, there is no more that they can do. The doctrines for which men are persecuted live on and their professors multiply in spite of penalties. That is an unfailing consolation to the persecuted. "Keep up your courage and play the man," said Latimer to his companion at the stake. "We shall this day light such a candle in England, by God's help, as shall never be put out." And that candle is alight to this day. More than that, persecution recoils on the persecutors. Read the miseries of Mary's last days and of other monarchs who have wielded that sword and see the retribution. The lesson of the failure of the persecuting spirit we still need to learn. We do not extirpate error by driving the minister from his pulpit, or forcing him out of his university chair. We rather excite sympathy for him and lead the world to see that the man who suffers for his faith is sincere.

Prayer-Meeting Topics

WHAT is sin, its nature, influence, result and punishment?

How should daily life be affected by the fact of eternity and a world to come?

Should we realize our personal relation to these great truths, and have them constantly before us?

Is prayer a privilege and duty, and what should practically result from its practice?

Should we be consistent? How far may our lives conform to Bible requirements?

What should be our personal experience? May we know God and may we hold our knowledge of divine things and continually make progress, or must we necessarily fall back at times?

Are we required to confess Christ daily, and if so, when, to whom, and in what form?

What kind of reading honors God, and is consistent with his love and service?

Is not analysis or comprehension of God and his providence impossible?

How may Christ become in us the power of God and the wisdom of God?

How the Prodigal Came Back

A Story of the Bowery Mission

DURING the last few years a number of our converts have been called home to heaven. Among them was Jabez Edwin Barrett, who died recently under peculiarly pathetic circumstances.

I knew Barrett even before I became Superintendent of the Bowery Mission. He was a type of hundreds of young men who find themselves stranded in the great city as the result of dissipation, and who, laboring under a burden of shame and discouragement, seem to find it impossible, through sheer lack of moral courage, to communicate with their friends or relatives. He was a young man of great intelligence, a proficient musician, highly educated, and had held several good positions at sea.

After losing sight of him for a year or two, he came to see me one day at the Mission, and I believe now that he did so with the feeling that his days were numbered, and that it was necessary for him to "put his house in order." We secured a position for him and he became a resident at the Memorial House. The Memorial House is an adjunct of the Mission, a Christian boarding house, where between 40 and 50 of our converts live under the affectionate supervision of one of our most trusted workers.

Here Barrett lived for several months a quiet, uneventful life, and happy, save for the fact that the insidious disease of consumption had fastened itself upon him, and was slowly wearing out his life.

I was just starting off on a journey to England when the news came to me that Barrett had been taken to the hospital, and that the doctors had pronounced his case hopeless. I rushed over to Brooklyn, but the wrong address had been given me and I could not find him. I never saw him again. In accordance, however, with the promise that I had given him, as soon as I arrived in London I visited his parents. His father occupies an honored position in one of the largest financial institutions of the world, and when I announced myself as being from New York his face turned pale and his lips quivered as he said, "You have a message from my boy." On answering him in the affirmative he took me down to his home, and I had the painful message to deliver to the sorrowing father and mother of their son's precarious condition. Almost before I had finished the story the father was on his feet pacing the room in distress, and determined to take the next boat in order, if possible, to bring his son home. This, however, he found it impossible to do owing to certain business engagements. He sought the assistance of his brother, the uncle of our friend, who came over at once, and finding his nephew at the time somewhat stronger, he took passage by the same boat back again and managed to get the sick man aboard. His father proceeded to Liverpool to meet him and went on the tender appointed to bring the passengers to the landing stage. Assisted by the doctor and his uncle, the young invalid walked down the slope from the steamer to the tender, and, grasping his father's hand, gave him one loving look, spoke the two words, "My father!" and died in his arms.

One Sunday morning, not very long after, a most impressive memorial service was held in the Mission. The great audience of men, amongst whom he had so recently worked, and by whom he was so much beloved, were deeply touched by the pathos of the situation. Hymns were sung that were known to be his favorites, probably the most appropriate being, "When the Roll is Called up Yonder I'll Be There." When Mr. Hunt, the soloist of the Mission, rose to sing, he told the men that Barrett had often in his days of weariness asked him to sing "My Father Knows," and as the men joined in the chorus they felt what a sweet message had come to them from the grave of their departed friend.

A touching letter was read from the uncle who accompanied him on his last ocean voyage, giving the details of the meeting between father and son. The testimonies of the men that morning were of remarkable pathos, as they spoke of the reality of the young man's conversion, and the beautiful life of Christian resignation he lived during the months he was in the Memorial House. Some of the men spoke of his helpfulness—how he had secured them situations, and how he had visited them in the hospitals.

Mrs. Bird, "the Mother of the Bowery," told in touching language of her pleasant half-hour's interview with Barrett in the hospital a week before he sailed. Almost his last words to her were, "Tell Mr. Hallimond that I know my sins are all forgiven, and I am ready to go; and tell him I owe it all to the Bowery Mission."

The remains of this restored prodigal were interred in the Chingford Mount Cemetery, just outside the great teeming British metropolis. On his tombstone, his sorrowing parents had inscribed:

It is the voice of Jesus that I hear:
His are the hands outstretched to draw me near,
And his the blood that can for all atone,
And set me faultless there before the Throne.

Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

J. G. HALLIMOND,
Superintendent.

Lessons of the Trees*

IF trees had really tongues, as Shakespeare's duke suggested, what interesting stories they could tell! The veteran oak is witness to the vows of the modern youth, as it was to those of his parents and grandparents. The boy that a hundred years ago played under its shadow comes to it to sit on the seat around its trunk and rest his octogenarian frame. Nay, there are trees, woodmen tell us, whose years make even the centenarian oak a stripling in comparison, for they were flourishing when Columbus came to find the New World. Theirs, however, is a silent life, though we may draw lessons from their beauty and usefulness.

The Psalmist had evidently observed the trees attentively. With the poet's eye, he saw in the tree rejoicing in abundant moisture, and living its luxuriant life, an image of the good man, and in the bay tree, spreading itself ostentatiously and uselessly, a symbol of the wicked. Isaiah, too, saw in the trees types of his contemporaries, and of the national life of his time. But it is when we come to Christ himself, who was an ardent lover of nature, that under his master touch the trees become eloquent. Who, for instance, can ever exhaust the full meaning of that address, beginning: "I am the true vine" (John 15: 1)? Or who can wholly realize the terrible lesson of the fig tree on which there were only leaves (Matt. 21: 19); or the solemn warning of the tree which had another year of probation (Luke 13: 6-9)? John caught the symbolical view of the trees when he portrays in the future Paradise the tree that bore twelve kinds of fruit, and grew leaves that were "for the healing of the nations." This picture in the last book of the Bible is the antidote of that other tree in the first book, the fruit of which, giving the knowledge of good and evil, affects us to this day.

But apart from these Scriptural allusions, the trees teach many and valuable lessons. The tree buffeted by wind and storm grows strong as no hot-house tree can grow and spreads its roots deep and far as the Christian, worried and persecuted, becomes stalwart, well grounded on the truth. The trees, too, have their enemies. Naturalists tell us that the most deadly is the minute insect that lays its eggs in the bark of the tree; and the towering giant of the forest, like a great character ruined by little sins, succumbs after weathering the storms of winter.

Strange Fire

By Mrs. M. Baxter

[OW came it that these sons of Aaron, these anointed and consecrated men, "took either of them his censand put fire thereon, and offered nge fire before the Lord, which he mmanded them not"? (Lev. 10: 1-11.) e fire which came from heaven was l's fire, and they were commanded to p it ever burning (Lev. 6:13); no th-kindled fire could be tolerated upon d's altar. There is something terribly emn in the fact that they who comted this daring sin of presumption were only ones mentioned by name, besides ses and Aaron, who came up unto the rd with the seventy elders of Israel in unt Sinai (Ex. 24: 9-10). Their positn as Aaron's eldest sons, their unusual ivileges, their solemn consecration, uld have led us to expect other things them.

"Cursed is the man that trusteth in n, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose art departeth from the Lord" (Jer. 5). Never let us make either gifts or ces an excuse for trusting in man. hen we see a Christian highly gifted, us bless our God, but not exalt man; en he appears to be full to overflowing h the unction of the blessed Spirit, ll let us know that in himself he is thing, and let us pray that God may ep him low, that he may continue to ss and to use him. "Keep back thy rvant also from presumptuous sins; let em not have dominion over me; then all I be upright, and I shall be innocent m the great transgression."

Awful judgment followed the sin of ese two priests. "And there went out e from the Lord, and devoured them; d they died before the Lord. Then oses said unto Aaron, This is it that the ord spake, saying, I will be sanctified in em that come nigh me, and before all e people I will be glorified. And aron [the bereaved father] held his ace." It must have been a fearful oment for him. "Like father, like on"; surely the sin of the golden calf, nd his own grievous part in it, must ave risen up before Aaron's eyes, but othing was to be done, and he must hold is peace. God is a holy God, his service a holy service. "Be ye clean that bear he vessels of the Lord" (Isa. 52: 11). or this reason "He shall sit as a refiner nd purifier of silver: and he shall purify he sons of Levi, and purge them as gold nd silver, that they may offer unto the ord an offering in righteousness" (Mal. 3: 3).

The cousins of the dead priests were alled to carry away the slain bodies, but neither father nor brothers might take ne last look at the dead, for God's priests were his property. Israel was nder the law; the time of grace was not et. "Now all these things happened nto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come" (I. Cor. 10: 11). God has made us kings and priests unto him; we are called, before all else, to be separate from the dead. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death" (Rom. 8: 2). As we have died in Christ to sin, and as we are crucified with Christ, contact with sin or with self becomes contact with the dead, and must not be allowed on any pretext whatever.

The verses which follow give us some clue to the origin of Nadab and Abihu's sin. "And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying, Do not drink wine or strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle." Alas! it seems likely that Nadab and Abihu, after the solemn days of consecration, had been drinking wine and had become excited, and the enemy had taken care that the excitement should take a religious turn, and thus it happened that they had desecrated the altar of their God by bringing an unhallowed offering and "strange fire."

How Jim Filled the Meeting

MR. ROBERT E. SPEER tells this incident of the Southern Appalachian Mountains: "A friend called my attention to a neighborhood of over seven hundred people without a church or a Sunday School. I asked him if there were any Christians. He said, 'No—oh, yes. There is one man down there who makes enough profession for a whole township.'

"Looking around, I saw a boy on horseback. I asked, 'Who is that boy?' The man gave me his name, saying, 'He is the meanest boy in all this country.'

"By this time the boy rode up. I reached out my hand, and said, 'Hello, Jim! Come up here; I want to shake hands with you.' I gave him a good, hearty shake, told him I was going to have a meeting at the schoolhouse, and asked if he knew where I could get a boy to go around and tell the people. He said, 'Will I do?' 'First-rate, if you will go.' 'All right; I am the boy you need.'

"We had hardly concluded our bargain before the boy put his hands upon his hips, turned to the old man who had been standing by, and said, 'I might as well commence now. Going to be a meeting at the schoolhouse next Sunday. Bring the old woman and all the kids along.'

"Sunday morning I drove to the schoolhouse a little early. To my surprise it was crowded, and a number of boys stood around the door. I said, 'Boys, I would like to get in.' One of them spoke up, saying, 'So'd we.' 'Let me in, and you can follow me.' 'No, we can't; it's chuck full clear up.' 'Nothing can be done until I get in.' 'You can't get in here.'

"I was obliged to go around and crawl in through the window. There sat my Jim on the front seat. He looked up with a smile, and said, 'I fetched 'em.' After my address, we organized the Sunday School. We went to a house nearby for dinner. When we were seated, the lady began to laugh. She said she was thinking about Jim. I asked what about him. 'Well, he rode into our front yard, never looked to see if any one was around, and began to yell: "Goin' to be a meeting down to the schoolhouse next Sunday morning at ten o'clock. Funniest fellow you ever see in your life will be thar! If you don't come you'll miss the biggest thing ever come to this part of the country!'"

Prof. Swift's Affliction

THE following letters, which will be read with interest by a very large number of our subscribers, explain themselves:

Marathon, N. Y., July 16, 1907.

Dear Sir: I regret to announce that, owing to my rapidly failing eighty-seven-year-old eyes, this must be my last answer to astronomical questions in The Mail-Bag.

I have kept some of the questions some time, hoping my suddenly failing sight would improve, but the failure is progressive.

From many personal letters received from your readers, I know that they have enjoyed them, and also been instructed, and I hope you have also been, to a certain extent, pleased with them.

Yours very truly,

Dr. Louis Klopsch, N. Y. Lewis Swift.

New York, July 18.

Dear Professor Swift:

Your letter, informing us that the condition of your eyes makes further astronomical work impossible, was received with genuine regret by the editorial staff of The Christian Herald. We all sympathize with you in your affliction, and trust that it may prove only temporary, and that your sight may yet be restored.

Your contributions have been a means of spiritual edification and valuable scientific instruction to many readers of this journal. From your own store of knowledge, you have generously enlightened them for several years on many topics which the layman could not discuss, and they have learned to regard you as an authority and a safe guide on such matters. They, too, will sympathize warmly with their astronomical mentor. Many will probably write to you, on learning of your affliction, and I believe you will be earnestly remembered in their prayers.

Very sincerely yours. Louis Klopsch.

Van Camp's
BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK AND BEANS

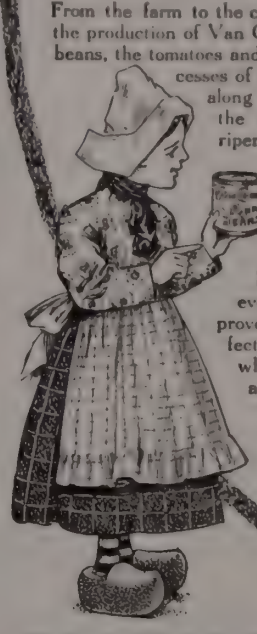
The "Extra" Quality that Proves them BEST

You discriminating housewives who have tried Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce—you are the ones who know from real experience that there is positively no satisfactory substitute for Van Camp's.

You know this, but do you know why? It's because Van Camp's have the "extra" care—the "extra" skill—the "extra" touch, which means "Extra" Quality.

And it's this "Extra" Quality which places the seal of superiority upon Van Camp's and sets them apart from all others in your mind. It gives to Van Camp's their spicy flavor, their piquant tang, their juicy richness, their delicious, appetizing taste.

From the farm to the can this "Extra" Quality is the dominant note in the production of Van Camp's. It begins with the raising of the beans, the tomatoes and the pork—continues through all the processes of preparation—and finally goes into the can along with the plump and nutty-flavored beans, the delicious tomato sauce, made from vine-ripened tomatoes, and the tender slice of corn-fed, home-grown pork.



Fact is, the "Extra" Quality is an inseparable part of Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce.

It's the intangible, subtle element which has taught you to think Van Camp whenever you think of pork and beans. It has proved to you that in Van Camp's are perfectly combined the irresistible goodness which is the dream of both the hungry man and the epicure, and the nutritive properties which give real strength and vitality

Would you be always prepared to open a can of "Extra" Quality in gastronomical emergencies? Then keep on hand a full supply of Van Camp's Pork and Beans with Tomato Sauce. But don't forget that "Extra" Quality means Van Camp's.

Why We Are Sacrificing These 1,400 Sets

¶ When we gave our first order to the binders, they submitted a Cover Design that w declined to accept; but before we could instruct them not to use it, nearly 1,400 sets had bee bound. As the delay was ours, we received the books and paid for them. As our Nev Premiums are about to come in, we must close out this Stock in order to make room for ou immediate requirements. Therefore we now Offer the Entire Balance (Regular Price $2.00 at the Absurdly Low Figure of 60 Cents for the Set, express charges to be paid by the purchaser

¶ The Set Weighs nearly Five Pounds, and while it can be Delivered Anywhere in th United States on Prepayment of Forty Cents Charges, if the Purchaser resides within Reasonable Distance from New York City, Money can be Saved by having the books sent Charges Collect Purchasers at a distance should send the Express Charges with the Order, as the low rate o forty cents can be secured only on prepaid shipments.

The Difference Between these Sets and the $2 Sets

¶ As far as type, paper and presswork are concerned, there is absolutely no difference whatever, the same sheets serving for both editions. The only difference is in the design used on the cover which we considered too ornamental, and which was planned for colors instead of gold. To have offered both sets would have tended to confusion, hence we stored these books, temporarily, but now they must be sold. These sets are absolutely new, never having been removed from the original packing, and we guarantee them perfect, and, with the exception of the design explained above, duplicates in every sense of the word of our $2.00 Edition.

A Work that Should be in Every Library

Mr. Charles Noel Douglas, the compiler of Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, writes as follows concerning the Scope of this most Excellent Production:

¶ "In this work, the Independence Day Speaker, burning with patriotic ardor, can find numberless gems wherewith to enrich his oratorical flights. Here the enraptured swain and the lovelorn maid may drink at a literary fount of love that even Cupid himself might envy. In fact, there is scarcely a subject engaging the human mind, or an occasion, religious or secular, that has not been considered and garnished with a generous setting of appropriate quotations, and embodied in this work. In short, to the orator, the student, the man in the street, and to all lovers of literature, ancient and modern, poetic or prose, this work will be found to fill a long-felt want, and in its scope and general usefulness to be of inestimable value and absolutely indispensable."

The Maharajah's Heir-Apparent

Kangan, in the Sind Valley

SCENES IN FAR-AWAY CASHMERE

By CHARLES M. PEPPER

ONE of the most interesting countries in the world is Cashmere. It is a good way off, a 2,000-mile journey from Bombay up to the Himalayas. Nevertheless a good many people, including ge travelers, go up there, since there are only 200 les of the journey that cannot be made by railway.

Cashmere is a land of mountains, lakes and valleys. At the present time there is much interest in it on acnt of the uncertainty as to who will succeed the Maharajah or ruler. Being one of the native States, te British government es not exercise quite the e influence as in British dia in this matter, though ually its wishes regarding te succession are reected.

The present Maharajah, o is a very progressive er, has no son of his own succeed him. The heir parent, on whom his oice is said to rest, is his phew, a fine-looking Hind lad.

The ruler of Cashmere a Hindu and practises all e requirements of a vout monarch. One of e occasions is when he shes the feet of the ggars. The Mohammens have their mosques d the Hindus their tem-es. Hinduism is the anent faith, and the temple Martand, the ruins of hich are still standing, tes back to the second ntury before Christ. There e also the ruins of the mple of Singand, which e very old.

Though the ancient Cashere has much about it to tract the traveler, the odern country and its inhabitants are just as attractive. he journey up into Cashmere is usually taken in a nga, a two-wheeled coach, which holds four persons, o of whom face the front and two the rear. I went p in a mail tonga, which was carrying the mail that me from London by way of Bombay and from Hongong by way of Calcutta. The tonga is fairly comrtable for rough roads. Most of the natives use a ueer little two-wheeled vehicle called the ekka. It ems as light as an American sulky and not built to carry more than one person, yet four or five people will be crowded into it, their legs hanging over the wheels and the thills. There is a very large traffic by means of bullock carts.

Along the route are the stage houses or dak bungalows, where travelers may remain overnight and secure food and shelter. They are provided by the government. Usually one takes his own bedding, but some of them have all the conveniences of a hotel. There are also rest houses erected for the convenience of the Maharajah and the high officials when they travel.

The Hamlet of Aro, in the Beautiful Valley of Cashmere

The country life of the interior of Cashmere, I was told, has changed very little for centuries. In the valleys there are some very rich farming lands. The farm laborers or coolies do not wear the turban which is distinctive of the other classes, but a kind of skull cap. The women work in the fields with the men. They have a peculiar covering for the head, something like that worn by nuns. The Cashmere valleys are noted for their herds of fine sheep and cattle.

The capital of Cashmere is the city of Srinagar, but before it is reached there is the town of Baramulla on Wular Lake. This is the region that was made famous by Moore in his celebrated poem of "Lalla Rookh." The scenes to-day are not quite so gorgeous as the poet's fancy painted them; yet the mountains and the lakes are wonderfully beautiful. From Baramulla to Srinagar there is a fine road thirty miles in length which is bordered on each side by a continuous line of magnificent poplar trees.

Srinagar itself, which is a city of canals, rivers and lakes, is a kind of cross-roads of the Himalayas. The camel caravans from Yarkand and Turkestan come this way bearing their loads of fine goat's wool of the quality which can be obtained nowhere else in the world. It is also a starting point for explorers. When I was there Dr. Sven Hedin, the famous Swedish traveler, had just left on his journey into unknown Tibet, and Doctor Stein, who has made many important archæological and other discoveries for the Indian government, had gone over into Turkestan. There were half a dozen Americans, most of them ladies, who made this detour in their trip around the world. A New York girl had come out solely for the purpose of visiting some friends whom she had known in Canada. She was just starting on a return journey of 10,000 miles to New York and thought nothing of it. An English girl had come down from Lehen Ladakh, which is the farthest outpost of travel. Dr. and Mrs. Bullock Workman, of Boston, famous mountain climbers, were just in from some recent climbing, during which Mrs. Workman had surpassed her previous record of high climbing.

Srinagar has some fine hospitals and schools, which

A Call to Joy

TEXT: Phil. 4: 4:

"Rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say, Rejoice"

AN aged minister once said to me, "The entire character of my preaching has changed with my advancing years. As a young man I used to preach on the terrors of the law, on the wrath of God, on the warnings against sin and on the awful picture of the lake of fire drawn by St. John in the Apocalypse. But as I grew older, I found my favorite texts in the tender passages of the Psalms, in the loving words of Christ to his disciples set down by the beloved disciple and in the eloquent exordium on charity or love by the Apostle Paul. I find that the nearer I come to heaven the more my heart burns with an unutterable desire to see Christ's face and to have a part in the never-ending reunion of the redeemed, and therefore the less I think about the terrors of the judgment. Faith to me is becoming more and more the substance of things hoped for, and I am looking forward to peace and joy rather than backward at the drawn fiery sword of an avenging angel standing at the gate of Paradise." These are not the exact words of my venerable friend, but they convey the substance of his thought. Truly what this aged man said about his ministerial life, every minister who is conscious of advancing years feels as his soul grows riper and richer in spiritual development. More and more he loves to preach about the joys of the Gospel rather than about the destruction that is inevitable to one who leads a sinful life.

A Word from the Aged

Paul's letter to the Philippians was written near the close of his life. He had passed beyond the carnal part of his religious experience. He does not now think so much of Christ presiding in judgment as he does of the Jesus of salvation. He does not dwell so much on the leaping flames of the bottomless pit as he longs for the songs of Moses and the Lamb, and is thrilled at the thought of all the mercies and blessings with which Jesus will welcome him. Thus he comes to us not groaning a dirge but singing a psalm of praise. He comes to us with joy smiling upon his lip, with joy shining forth from his eye, with joy throbbing in his heart, and with joy in his congratulatory handshake. He comes to us with a rapturous exhortation, as he bids us take an inventory of our spiritual opportunities. He says, "Rejoice in the Lord alway." Then, as though he had not made this Gospel salutation emphatic enough, he repeats his words as he says, "Again I say, rejoice." Now to-day I am not going to talk to those who look upon the cross of Jesus Christ only as a means of escaping the horrors of eternal anguish. But I am going to talk to those who have so developed in the Christian life that their Gospel faith is a pleasure and a joy and a never-ending consolation. As I speak to you to-day I shall tell you why you should rejoice in the Lord alway, and why you should come to him with never-ending praise and with eternal thanksgiving.

Joy is a fruit that will not grow
In nature's barren soil;
All we can boast till Christ we know
Is vanity and toil;
But where the Lord has planted grace
And made his glories known,
There fruits of heavenly joy and peace
Are found, and there alone.

My Christian brother, you of the deeper and holier religious experience, you should, in the first place, rejoice in the Lord alway, because you have by your side who will ever guard you and keep you and be a very present help in all your troubles. He has a keener eye than you. He has a stronger arm than you. He has all the powers of heaven and earth at his command. He has a heart so tender and loving and self-sacrificing that he is willing to surrender all and do all if he can in any way help you in your struggle of life. He is not an absent friend a thousand miles away, who is going to meet you by appointment at the brink of the grave. But he is a friend so near that you can whisper to him and he will hear you. He is so near that you can put out your hand as a little tottering child, and he will grasp that hand and keep you from falling. He is so near that like a loving mother he will guard you when you are asleep and he will greet you with a smile when you awake in the morning. He will go with you to the breakfast table. He will follow you in the street and stand with you by the store counter. He is an ever-present Friend. But he is also omnipotent and omniscient, as well as omnipresent. Now ought it not to be a joy to you that this divine Friend, this Son of God, is always by your side to help you and care for you and love you?

A Divine Friend

The Beloved Comrade

You know what the power of a sanctified and holy and purified human friendship means. Years ago, in the dawn of young manhood, there came into your life a young girl. You thought you loved her at the time. You did not believe you could ever love any one more. But you did not truly know what love was. Life for you at the time was a picnic in the woods. You thought mostly about what you were to eat and drink and where you were to live and what jolly companions were to be your associates. You married that girl. When you married her you thought your honeymoon was to be the never-ending life of a bee in a flower garden, finding nectar wherever you went. But that honeymoon was of very short duration. After a while came the struggles of life and the storms and the bitter trials. Then that merry companion of your youth changed. She stood by your side in the crisis. She stood near you in the sick-room. When death invaded your home her hand joined yours in placing the flowers about the open casket. She literally poured out her life for you. Now, in the evening twilight of life, it is not so much the beautiful face that you love, or the merry laugh, or the golden curls. But it is the tender, true, faithful heart of that woman by your side, who has shared your troubles, as well as doubled your joys. Though she may not talk of love as much now as she did when a girl, yet you are never happy unless

She is in Touch with You

When evening comes in your home and you are sitting by the library table, the book is never interesting, nor does the fire in the hearth burn brightly enough, nor do the children play right, unless she is on the other side of that table. You who have been married for a quarter of a century, you know what it is to have a devoted, unselfish companion by your side. You know what it is to have that love pour out its life's blood for you. Like the aged poet you can sing this sweet love-song in your old age:

Oh, no, not even when first we loved
Wert thou as dear as now thou art;
Thy beauty then my senses moved,
But now thy virtues bind my heart.

Although my heart in earlier youth
Might kindle with more wild desire,
Believe me, it has gained in truth
Much more than it has lost in fire.

The flame now warms my inmost core,
That then but sparkled o'er my brow,
And though I seemed to love thee more,
Yet, oh, I love thee better now!

Well, that is my idea of the Christian life. In the beginning we accepted Christ from selfish motives. Perhaps we were in some great religious meeting and the evangelist was picturing the tortures of the lost. We became so frightened that we gripped the church pew for fear we should fall over the precipice of eternal doom. But after we accepted Christ with such a low motive the Christ love began to grow upon us. We see how he has been protecting us and how he has been leading us. We see in another place how he has fed and clothed us. When death came into our home we saw his great tears of compassion and love. Even in our financial distress or social persecution, he was always by our side. Then we began to realize how good and kind and loving he is. As we grow in grace we are never happy unless we feel his presence near. We talk to him as we do to a dear friend. We find ourselves saying, "Jesus, thou knowest best. Thou art leading me. Oh, Master! thy love passeth all understanding. Keep me close to thy heart. Let me never stray away from thy touch." Church members, are you strangers to the rapturous joy of the close companionship of this divine association? Then you have never reached the higher development of the Christian life. Believe me, there is something yet for you to pray for and struggle for in your Christian experience. Do not think to-day of Christ as an enemy. Think of Jesus as an ever-present personal, tender, loving Friend. That can be one of your greatest joys of the Christian life. He can be a Friend who will never leave your side.

But the true Christian finds in the higher spiritual life more than this divine companionship. No soul do we truly become one with Christ than we enter into the elevating associations of the best and purest men and women living upon the face of the earth to-day. We enter into a holy association with those who have felt the divine touch, and who have been recreated and made over, and been stamped with the divine image. These children of God are different from all other men and women, for they are radiating with the power of the spirit-filled life.

Glorified in the Fire

Some time ago it was my privilege to examine some of the most exquisite pieces of painted china. There was one plaque especially beautiful. It was a portrait of a young woman. The eyes were so true that they seemed open windows, out of which the soul was watching you. The cheeks were glowing with the flush of youthful health. The eyelashes were as distinct as the threads of an intricate piece of lace. What fascinated me most in that picture was a necklace of jewels about the throat of this portrait. The precious stones sparkled so realistically that it seemed as though the artist had finished his picture and then had gone to the jewel case of his model and strung about her neck the most brilliant gems of her treasure box. "How often did that piece of china have to be burned in order to produce that effect?" I asked my hostess, who was herself a painter. "Many, many times," was her answer. "We paint our china and then burn it. We keep on burning it, until at last we get just the right color in all parts of our pictures." "How true with God's kilns!" I said to myself. God takes a man's soul with its covering of clay. Then he moulds it. Then he paints it. Then he purifies it by his fires. Then he keeps on purifying that soul by the fires of tribulation until at last that human soul shines with the glow of the divine face." Thus is it with those people who have been living closest to God. When we reach the higher spiritual life we are able to fellowship with the purified souls. There are no companions and no friends who can produce joy like that association.

The Christian's Recreation

"But," says some church member, "I do not want to live in a prayer-meeting all the time. I do not want to be singing psalm tunes morning, noon and night. Sanctified people may be all right in their places, but a steady diet of 'angel's food' nauseates the stomach. I like to frolic and play. I like to go to see a baseball game and play other kinds of games. I like to fish. I like to hunt. Indeed, I like fun just as much as I did twenty years ago. In other words, I like to do something besides going to church and talking about the Bible and foreign and home missions." So do good people like fun. So do the purest and best of God's disciples like recreation. There is no class of men and women that has a better time than Christian people. But, my friends, it makes a great deal of difference what you call fun. If you cannot find your best enjoyment in life, as well as your best spiritual exhilaration, among God's children, then there is something wrong with your own spiritual life, and you had better get down on your knees and ask God to place you in one of his spiritual kilns to refine your nature so that you will be able to find your joys in holy companionship.

An old proverb goes thus: "What is meat for thy neighbor may be poison for thee." That means, the food upon which your brother's physical organism thrives may be that which will not nourish your body. The proverb is emphatically true in reference to the enjoyments of the spiritual and the worldly life. The pleasures that fascinate the ungodly are generally pleasures that are repugnant to the spiritual man.

It is an alarming sympton of a man's spiritual condi

CHRISTIANS FROM MANY LANDS

otographed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

The Welcome Meeting in London of the Evangelical Alliance Conference, Showing Representatives from all parts of the World

THERE has just concluded in London the Eleventh International Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, which has been attended by Christians from practically every part of the world. The Conference, important as it was, was rendered all the more interesting by the fact that the Alliance was celebrating its "Diamond Jubilee." It was founded in 1846.

The Conference lasted for six days, and attracted large numbers of prominent Christians and leaders in theological thought and religious life. A crowded welcome meeting, presided over by Lord Kinnaird, formed a fitting prelude to the week's gatherings. On the platform were representatives from many foreign lands. The Bishop of Durham and Dr. Barrett of Norwich expounded the principles of the Alliance, and then an opportunity was given to each of the delegates to speak. America was ably represented by Dr. Leander T. Chamberlain, and among the others who spoke were Bishop Cabrera, Spain; Bishop Hartzell, Africa; Baron Nicolai, Russia; Professor Hulbert, Korea; Mr. Paul B. Nagano, Japan; and Mr. Cheng Ching-yi, China. The last-mentioned was attired in a gaily-colored costume, and though his English was broken, he created a deep impression by his earnest manner.

Such well-known leaders in the churches as Prof. Orr, Glasgow, Dr. Hanson, Bishop Welldon, Dr. Wace, Dean of Canterbury, Dr. Pierson and Dr. Campbell Morgan, as well as most of the foreign delegates, took part in the various gatherings, at which questions affecting Christian life and unity were discussed.

on, if the wholesome influences of home life are repugnant to him. My brother, although you may be a church member, your appetite for pleasure is a sinful craving, if you cannot enjoy the pure, clean, refreshing joy of Christian association. If that is so, for God's sake get down on your knees and pray to your heavenly Father that he will purify you, so that you may find your greatest enjoyments among his people, and among his true, consecrated followers.

The Joy of Service

But there is another joy which comes to the higher spiritual life, and that is the joy of Christian service. What is the joy of the noble-hearted men who always want to share their blessings with everyone else. That is the joy of the true man who, when he has plenty of bread, wants to share it with the hungry. When he has a cure for the blinded eyes, he wants to give it to those groping about in darkness. When he can unstop the deaf ears, he wants to make the deaf to hear and the dumb to speak. No man is a true man who, when he has an abundance, is not ready to share his plenty with those who are in want. The poet well defined this thought when he wrote:

> Who seeks for heaven alone to save his soul,
> May keep the path, but will not reach the goal.
> While he who walks in love may wander far,
> Yet God will bring him where the blessed are.

Many years ago, a noted painter, Alexander Nasmyth, went to visit near the towering cliffs in the vicinity of picturesque Blair Castle in Old Scotland. While he was watching those massive, overtopping crags, he said, "Is it not too bad yonder bare rocks are not crowned with a covering of green?" Then he bethought himself of two huge cannon which were mounted in the yard of the old castle. "Ah," he said, "I know what I will do. I will have some canisters made to fit these old cannon. Then I will fill those canisters with all kinds of grass seeds. Then I will shoot those canisters against yonder cliffs, where no foot of man has ever trod. Then those canisters will break, the seeds will scatter and take root, and yonder cliffs will some day be covered with a mass of green foliage." This is just what the Scottish painter did. Many of those seeds were lost, but some took root and they sprouted, and now those crags near old Blair Castle are the most beautiful of all the surrounding hillsides. Thus is it with the consecrated Gospel life, when the true Christian is filled with the Christ love. When the face of Jesus becomes to him a living, loving, inspiring and all-absorbing reality, then that Christian says, "I must bring this Christ love into other lives. I must have Christ do for others what he has done for me." Then the true Christian, as soon as he has developed into the higher spiritual life, fills his hands with the Gospel seed. He goes forth into the waste places of the earth. He scatters those seeds up in the mountains and down in the valleys; he scatters them in the homes of the rich and in the hovels of the poor; he scatters them everywhere. And one of the chief reasons why I know some of you have never been truly filled with the Christ love, is because you do not find any joy in bringing this Christ to your fellow men. Next to seeing Christ's face ourselves, our chief joy should be found in bringing that divine love into the hearts of a sinful world.

The Concealed Portrait

Henry Van Dyke tells a powerful story of the finding of one of the most beautiful faces of Dante upon the walls of the Bargello at Florence. For years this picture was supposed to have been destroyed. Tradition told of its wonderful beauty, but no one could tell where it was. Some said it had been stolen; some said a vandal had destroyed it. At last an Italian artist devoted himself to the task of finding it. He went to the palace where he believed it to be and made a thorough search. Guided by his knowledge of such buildings, he concluded that the picture would be in a certain room that was then being used as a store room. He had the heaps of rubbish removed from its floors and then carefully examined the walls. There, hidden by the whitewash and the accumulated filth of years, he found the picture.

This is like the work the Christian has to do in the world. In the degraded beings of the slums, in the debased wrecks of the haunts of vice, the image of God may be found. It is for the Christian worker to go and clear away the sinful habits, the filth of foul associations, and to bring out the beauty of that hidden face. Have you ever had the joy of doing this? If you have not had this joy you have not yet reached the higher realms of the Christian life. May God help you to love him so much that in time you will find one of your chief enjoyments of life in teaching sinful men and women to love Christ as intensely as Jesus loves you.

But, lastly, I remark that one of the greatest joys of the Christian is the comfort we have in dedicating our dear children and our loved ones to his service. Every true parent knows that when he attempts to raise a family, there comes a time when he realizes he must have supernatural aid. We feel our children gradually and yet surely slipping out of our hands. They are going forth into the great wide world with all its manifold temptations. We lift up our hands at times in agony, and cry: "Oh God, if we could only keep them by our sides!" But we cannot. It is an overwhelming thought, but surely and swiftly the children are moving away from our side. Now comes the question: "How can I keep my children in the path of virtue and of truth?" The Bible tells me. My God is a covenant-keeping God. My God says, "I will save thee and through thee I will save thy children." He promises that if we will teach our children about him, if we set them a good example, and commit them in prayer to his keeping, he will take care of them and make them his children.

Complete Consecration

The chief trouble with our spiritual experience is that we do not come near enough to Jesus Christ. We do not give ourselves up in our entirety to his service. The reason that we find the spiritual life a burden, an irritant and a troublous duty, is because we are not developed high enough in the Gospel graces. My brother, the great trouble with your religious life is that you are like a timid bather on the beach, afraid to make one big plunge and go chin deep and heart deep and brain deep into the depths of God's mercy. You want to love him by inches and not with your entire being. You are like the rich young ruler: you are not willing to give all for your Master. Friend, if you would rejoice in the Lord alway, come closer to the mercy-seat. Friend, if you would have the Pauline rapture, then leave your sinful self at Damascus and start for your martyrdom at Rome. Unless you and I are willing to consecrate ourselves to the higher spiritual life, then will the joy of the Gospel appeal to us in vain. "Rejoice in the Lord always; again I say, rejoice," means: "Surrender thy whole love to Jesus Christ, in order that thou mayest enjoy Christ's whole love for thee."

ROBERT FULTON AND HIS TRIUMPH

The American Who Built the First Successful Steamboat

The "York." Ferryboat. 1811

ONE HUNDRED years ago last month, the people of this country and of Europe who planned to travel by sea or river did so with the expectation that it would always be done by sailing ship or sailboat, and that no matter at what time they might start there would be little chance of their foretelling when they should arrive at their destination. A hundred years ago this month, and all that was changed. A man named Robert Fulton, who had been working for years on the problem of steam navigation, completed near New York a boat whose paddles sent it along at the speed of the best sailing craft, yet which was dependent neither on the favor of the wind nor the ebb or flow of tides. The second week of August, 1807, when the boat made its great trip up the Hudson, was undoubtedly the most important in its results of any in the history of commerce, navigation and trade.

Fulton Coat of Arms

Fulton never claimed that he conceived the idea of the steamboat, nor that he was the first one who had propelled a craft by steam. In fact, he followed a long line of experimenters, whose efforts had extended over a century before his time; but he did build the first one that was a real success, which convinced people that at last a sailless vessel had been found that was of true value and not an experimental toy.

Though Fulton's fame rests in the popular mind on the building of the steamboat Clermont, he accomplished several other noteworthy things that made him well known in his day. He was a civil engineer as well as an inventor. He took up the idea of submarine boats, which we are apt to think of as essentially of our day. He developed a system of harbor defense mines. He invented the torpedo and blew up a ship with it, another thing we regard as of 1907 instead of a hundred years ago. He invented submarine batteries, improvements in canals and aqueducts. In addition, he was an artist of ability, and portraits painted by him rank well with those painted by any of his contemporaries.

Fulton was born in 1765, in the town of Little Britain, Pa. Later, in honor of her illustrious son, the name was changed, and it is now known as Fulton. He was of Scotch descent. His family had been established for centuries in the land of the thistle. The Fultouns of Fultoun were a hardy race, and, if the records are true, did not lack in aggressiveness, and were ever at the fore when hard knocks were going. One branch of the family went to Ireland when the Scotch were going there in large numbers, induced by attractive land grants. The inventor's father, also named Robert, left Ireland for the New World, and settled at Lancaster, Pa.

It is interesting to find that young Fulton's teacher thought him a dull pupil. His mind was more interested in other studies than those that were taught by the Quaker schoolmaster. He ingeniously invented for himself a lead pencil that brought him into favor with the schoolmaster, who had him make pencils for the entire school. There were large gun-shops in the place, and young Fulton became very popular with the mechanics; his drawings being used in construction, and his suggestions receiving a respectful hearing. It was on a fishing trip with a playmate and his playmate's uncle that the idea of a paddle boat first came to him. He constructed one for the fishing trip that had four paddles to a side, and the motive power was furnished by the two boys themselves. As was always his custom, he first made a model. This was left as old lumber in his aunt's garret for years; but when fame came to the young inventor, it was rescued and became a highly prized ornament of her drawing room.

At eighteen, Fulton was making a good living as an artist in Philadelphia. His father and Benjamin West, the American artist who had won fame in London, were friends, and Fulton, armed with letters of introduction to prominent people in England, started for Europe. West took him into his family, and young Fulton soon had enough to do. Gradually he dropped the pencil for his engineering work. His new system of inclined planes for lifting and lowering canal boats attracted attention, and his system of canal locks was at once put into use after the first demonstration of their practicability. Several locks were built by Fulton in England that at last accounts were still in use.

In 1797 he was in France with a friend, Joel Barlow. He induced the government to supply funds for a plunging submarine boat. The boat he built was a success. It plunged to the depth of twenty-five feet in the harbor of Brest. Fulton remained down one hour. On the surface the boat was a first-class sloop. The sails would be struck and all made ready to plunge in two minutes. He had an engine, managed by two men, which moved the boat beneath the surface at the rate of fifteen hundred feet in seven minutes. He had with him submarine missiles to which he afterward gave the name of torpedoes. One of these he fired from the submarine at a sloop six hundred feet distant, and blew it to pieces. Further experiments ceased from lack of funds, though the French naval officers were enthusiastic over his success.

The "Paragon," 1811

It would take several books instead of one article to give details of Fulton's various inventions that led finally to devote his time to the building of a practical steamboat.

Chancellor Livingston, of New York, was greatly interested in the theory of steam navigation, followed the progress of various inventors, and spent much money in attempting to construct steamboats. In 1798 the legislature of New York gave him the exclusive privilege of navigating all boats that might be moved by steam upon the waters of the State. The bill was passed more as a joke than as a serious measure. Livingston met Fulton in Paris. A steamboat was constructed that sank from the weight of the machinery. The news of the disaster was a sad blow to the hopes of both. In raising the boat from the icy water of the River Seine, Fulton contracted the lung trouble that affected him until his death. The boat was rebuilt and went fairly well, but had too many structural defects to be considered a great success.

In 1806 the legislature of New York renewed the grant of steam navigation, but to Fulton and Livingston jointly.

The Clermont was constructed in a shipyard on the East River during the winter of 1806-7. Fulton had Charles Brown as his builder, a man who was later to construct many of Fulton's steamers. A model of the Clermont is in the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, D. C. It differs quite a little from the pictures of the boat that have come down to us. The model was constructed from Fulton's first plans, and it is probable that he may have altered his arrangements as the building progressed. As the pictures were drawn by people who saw the Clermont during her Hudson River trip and after in use as a passenger boat, it is probable that the pictures give the most accurate idea of the vessel. Fulton wrote that he made the trip to Albany and from New York and back again entirely by steam power and without the use of sails. The model at Washington has two large square sails.

When she was finished, the boat that was to revolutionize navigation, change commercial systems and bring the nations of the earth several months and weeks nearer to one another was one hundred and thirty feet long, four deep, and little over sixteen wide, measured at the paddle-wheels. The boiler was of sheet iron, twenty feet long and set in heavy masonry. The boat was decked only at the stem and the stern, the paddle-wheels and machinery being exposed. There was, however, a cabin for the officers and a covering above the boiler. The paddles had cast-iron shafts, which broke several times, and later were replaced with wrought-iron shafts, which worked well. The paddles were not strengthened with several circles of supports as at present, but had much the appearance that a large dray wheel would have if the tire and rim had been removed. One writer of the day, commenting on her appearance, says that, minus the wheels and the smokestack, she looked like an enormous skiff. Fulton named her the Clermont in honor of his friend and patron, Livingston, of Clermont-on-the-Hudson. One writer in 1808 records that, while a passenger on the vessel, he looked over the stern and saw the name Katherine of Clermont. By most of the writers of the day, however, she is designated simply as the Clermont. It is a remarkable fact that, with but few changes, the first boat of Fulton's possesses most of the features of the modern river steamboat of to-day. Improvements have been made, but the system is practically the same. If the builder could come back to earth and see the great Hendrik Hudson go up the river from New York, he

The "Clermont's" Voyage up the Hudson

Doubtless he had heard of the primitive submarine with which an attempt was made during the Revolution to blow up British vessels in New York Harbor. The boat had gone under the ships, but the explosives could not be attached to the hulls.

They were wkened by the "chug chug" of the engine and the th of the water as the paddles struck sharply against he waves. The sailors rushed on deck to see what all he fuss was about. Bearing down on them they saw a o whose masts were bare of sails, but which was ng along at a good pace, moved by some unseen o,r. Few of the sailors had ever e d of a steam engine, and none of h of Fulton's boat. Apparently h new sea monster was afire inside, o from a high black pipe issued le e clouds of smoke.

his little trip was satisfactory to F on, and two days later the public w invited through the newspapers to ome down to the docks in New Y k City and see the first demonstra- ti of what the steamboat could do. T public came, but with the idea th they would see a ridiculous fail- u Invitations had been sent es- p ally to prominent business men and m bers of the legislature who had o osed the project. A few of these c e with the idea that it would be p sant to see the disappointment of t people who had been so rash as t nvest money in the wild scheme of Inventor Fulton. A few stayed away with the remark that the whole a ir was beneath their consideration.

The people who swarmed about the dock made rude je es on the ungainly craft, and jeered the crew as they p pared to put the Clermont in motion. The lines w e cast off. The great wheels began to revolve, and t rning the water briskly the Clermont moved steadily i into the harbor. The jeers and jokes ceased, and for a few minutes the crowd on the dock seemed stupefied.

Mr. Golden, who saw the trial trip, wrote soon after, "The man who, while he looked on the expensive machine, thanked his stars that he had more wisdom than to waste his money on such idle schemes, changed the expression of his features as the boat moved from the wharf and gained her speed. His complacent smile gradually stiffened into an expression of wonder."

Faster and faster moved the Clermont, and the crowd broke first into exclamations and at last into ringing cheers. As the uproar came over the water to Fulton he knew that one of his hardest tasks was over; the public had been convinced.

Fulton made one change after this trial; the paddle wheels were made shorter so that they would not strike so far below the surface of the water, thus increasing the boat's speed greatly.

Monday, August 11, was chosen as the day to start on the great trip up the navigable length of the Hudson from New York to Albany. Again the crowd assembled at the dock, a crowd that far outnumbered the previous one; and this time it came to cheer and not to jeer. The boat started at 1 o'clock. It traveled all the afternoon and all night northward, and at 1 o'clock on Tuesday the Clermont touched at Chancellor Livingston's home, one hundred and ten miles from New York. Wednesday it finished the trip to Albany. The one hundred and fifty miles had been done in thirty-two hours of actual steaming. The boat had made an average of five miles an hour.

Several graphic reports have come down to us of the interest the strange craft created. Fulton had the wind against him all the way. He passed several sloops and schooners that were beating to windward, and the Clermont went by them as if they had been at anchor. The river crews, apparently, had not heard of the Clermont's appearance at New York, for they were as terror-stricken as the harbor boatmen had been.

The people along the shore fled to the hills back from the river and from there watched the "burning monster" disappear northward. Most of them were convinced that it was a warning of the coming judgment day. The four men visible upon the deck only added to the mystery. At Albany the whole town turned out to see the strange craft. Most of the people there eyed it with distrust and were content at first to view it from a respectful distance.

"Car of Neptune," 1808

The boat was at once prepared for general passenger service. It was completely decked and a cabin was constructed with comfortable bunks. In 1808 she began her regular service. On her first trip back in this year the Clermont's boiler blew up, but fortunately no one was hurt.

The river men realized that their monopoly of the river traffic was fast disappearing. They fouled the Clermont on every possible occasion, and frequently she had to complete her voyage with only one wheel, the other having been scraped off by some passing schooner that had been steered into her. They sued Fulton and Livingston and tried to have steamboats suppressed. The encroachments of other inventors added to Fulton's vexations. Other steamboats were built almost yearly under his direction, each one an improvement on the one that preceded it. Several of these are pictured in this article.

He built several ferryboats that ran across the East River to Long Island, and thus did away with the troubles that attended the passage when there were only rowboats or horseboats. The latter brought forth the following from Mr. Banvard:

> How well I remember the horseboat that paddled
> 'Cross the East River ere the advent of steam, > Sometimes the old driver the horses would straddle,
> And sometimes ride 'round on the circling beam.

Fulton's Birthplace

Fulton's new boat crossed in fifteen minutes while heavily loaded. His last great effort was the construction of the Fulton, a steam warship. He died in 1815, and was buried in old Trinity, on Broadway, in New York City. In honor of Fulton, there is now being built a magnificent mausoleum to hold his remains, a fit work for the centennial year of Fulton's success in steam navigation. Patriotic and scientific societies will hold meetings to honor his memory.

e maintained by the Europeans. It also has carpet tories which supply carpets to wealthy people in the ited States. The shawls which were once so cele- ted lost their market many years ago; but as an stration of the fine art of shawl-making as the tives of the country knew it, there is in the museum hawl map of Cashmere showing the rivers, mountains, lleys, lakes and other physical features of the country. But after all, the people of Cashmere, as of other rts of the world, are more interesting than the pro- cts and manufactures. I had the good fortune to see ne of the natives of the remoter mountain regions, who e rarely seen. They were the Gilgits. It was the occa- n of the visit of Lord Minto, the Viceroy, and the lgit chiefs and their followers had come down from eir own regions to take part in the ceremonies in his nor.

The Gilgits had a camp of their own which was very gipsy-like, and they themselves had much the appearance of gipsies. They wore queer-looking sheepskin caps with saucer-like rims, and their hair was unkempt. But their physiques were strong and well-knit, and they were splendid horsemen. Their horsemanship was exhibited in the game of polo, and it is said that the Gilgits are the original polo players. The exhibition they gave in the tournament which had been arranged for the benefit of the Viceroy certainly was very original. Two teams were matched on the grounds between two mud walls about four feet high. The course was 900 feet long, and only 100 feet broad. They played the game up and down the narrow space at breakneck pace, handling the ball with great skill, yet with what seemed unnecessary recklessness. But none of them appeared to mind the hard knocks.

While the game was going on musicians of each team played very weird tunes in order to encourage their respective sides. The players wore brightly-colored coats and peculiar boots. When the game was over they performed their country marches to the accompaniment of a strange music; at least it was strange to my ears. Later they watched a game of cricket between English residents, but they did not seem to care much for it, and after their own wild racing on the backs of their ponies, cricket did seem rather tame.

Among the Gilgit chiefs were some who were given especial honors because of their high rank. When I was wandering around their camp a fine-looking young chief in a rich purple mantle stepped out of his tent and saluted me with the salaam which is the current greeting everywhere in Eastern countries. Though that was the only word we had in common, he showed me around and was particularly pleased at my admiration of the horses. Afterward I was told that this chief was the Rajah of Stok, a descendant of the Kings of Tibet.

A Tragedy of the Pacific

THAT human life is frail and uncertain—a brief journey, which may end in a moment—is the lesson that is taught us by the recent numerous disasters on land and sea. The hundred passengers who went down in the wreck of the ill-fated steamship Columbia off the Mendocino coast, in California waters, had no premonition of the impending calamity. Suddenly, in the middle watch of a foggy night, when all were fast asleep in their berths, there was a crash, an alarm, and two hundred and forty-nine human beings were brought face to face with the grim messenger. More than one-third of the whole sank down with the ship, within eleven minutes after her collision with the San Pedro.

Survivors have told fragmentary stories of the awful tragedy; but who can adequately describe the anguish of those moments of suspense before the end came? Only in imagination may we picture the rude awakening from peaceful sleep; the hurried rush on deck in the dark; the frenzied adjusting of life-preservers, and the launching of boats and rafts, while the great steel vessel every moment sank deeper and deeper in the waves. We seem to hear the hysterical cries of the terror-stricken; the sad farewells between dear ones, and the last prayers as the waters engulfed all who could not escape.

There were many godly men and women on the Columbia, and these, we cannot doubt, met their fate with Christian fortitude. Her captain, like a brave and faithful sailor, refused to leave his sinking vessel, and his last efforts were exerted to save his passengers. He went down with his ship and his name will henceforth be inscribed on the immortal roll of the heroes of the sea.

He that waits upon God is ready whensoever death comes, whether upon the ocean or on the solid land. To the Christian, death is simply the end of the journey, the Father's welcome summons home.

The Anniversary of the Steamboat

THE year 1907 is the anniversary year, marking by centuries, of many events of great import to the American people. Four hundred years ago our continent received the name by which we know it now; three hundred years ago the first settlement was made at Jamestown; and one hundred years ago, on the eleventh of August, Robert Fulton went up the Hudson River in the steamboat Clermont, a boat which so changed the modes of travel and communication that it is not possible for the human mind or the human eye to gauge even a small part of the results.

It is well in our self-centred age, when most people seem to believe that all of the great things are the creation of the living, and pay little heed to what has been accomplished in past years, to be awakened by the present centennial of steam navigation to what we owe to such men as Fulton. So many wonderful things have been done recently by men of science that even the most erratic person with an idea seems sure of a respectful hearing in some quarter, as he may have in his mind the germ of some great invention that will be of incalculable benefit to mankind. It was not so in Fulton's day; he and his fellow investigators had to work with the common-sense of the day against them. He was regarded as an accomplished engineer who had done much in his profession, but who was given to scientific dreams, foremost among these being the idea that he could construct a boat that would not depend for motive power on wind and sails, but which would be moved by the new power of steam. For years he worked amid trials and discouragements that would weaken the stoutest hearts, one of the finest examples of dogged perseverance in the history of mechanics. When victory came its financial results were comparatively small, yet we have reason to believe that Fulton felt that his greatest reward was in what he had given to the world, not what he had taken from it.

The Increase of Crime

SO many deeds of violence have been committed in different parts of the country within the last few weeks, that the familiar midsummer "crime wave" theory is again brought forward to account for the startling increase. But this theory, however plausible it may appear, does not work out satisfactorily. Criminologists, while recognizing that in a few isolated instances the weather may affect individuals to the extent of making them temporarily irresponsible, go far deeper in their search for the causes of any sudden outburst of crime. They take into account inherited tendencies, environment, and other considerations which have no relation to the weather at all.

In a mixed population like that in most large American cities, there are elements which, while quiet and law-abiding under favorable conditions, are liable to become dangerous whenever laws are loosely administered and the proper safeguards are relaxed or withdrawn. Thus, let a single district of any city be "wide open"; let saloons and gambling dens and vicious resorts be free to do their evil business unmolested, and that district will quickly become a centre of crime, which will contaminate all around it. If, in addition to this, it be demonstrated that the officers of the law are incompetent to deal with the situation, or unwilling, for any reason, to enforce the law with due severity, then we may reasonably expect a crop of crimes such as have lately shocked many localities—murders, hold-ups, burglaries, thefts and assaults.

It is useless to rail against any race or nationality. Crime is not exclusively monopolized by any people under the sun. If it were, it could be easily handled and stamped out. If the debarring of any particular nationality from immigration privileges would appreciably diminish crime, it would become the duty of Congress to close the gates to that race or nation forthwith. We have laws for the exclusion of undesirables, which, if faithfully administered, would keep out many who unfortunately seem to get in too easily. These laws, rigidly applied, would exclude the lazzaroni, the illiterate, the defective, the worthless non-worker and non-producer, the criminal and the incendiary agitator. That too many of these do get in is undeniable. The new immigration law, which went into effect last month, and which was specially drawn by Secretary Root for the purpose of dealing with foreign revolutionists and agitators who seek to make this country a place of vantage from which to carry on their plots, will no doubt have an admirable effect. Congress, however, may be expected to take up the whole immigration question soon, and when it does, we may expect to see a radical revision of existing laws, not for the discouragement of the genuine toiler and the honest home-seeker, but to make it clear that there is no place or welcome here for any class whose presence would be a menace to the peace and security of our people.

Unknown Tongues

ARE we about to witness in these rationalistic days a manifestation of the mysterious "Gift of Tongues"? Reports from many quarters imply this, and therefore it becomes us to observe the phenomenon carefully and not to speak hastily of it or denounce it without good reason. All the more need is there, however, for discrimination, lest we mistake mere human hysteria for the manifestation of divine power.

The phenomena vary in some details, but in the main are of similar character. In a religious meeting in which God is besought in earnest and intense prayer to bestow the Holy Spirit that his people may have an accession of holiness and power for service, there is a sense of waiting, such as there was when the apostles waited on the day of Pentecost. Out of the silence there rises a hysterical cry, thrilling every one present. This is followed by the utterance of a torrent of words, incomprehensible and unintelligible to the hearers, and often to the speaker himself. Occasionally there may be a word recognizable as Hebrew, Greek, or some other language, but, for the greater part, the speech is simply gibberish. An expert stenographer sent us recently a verbatim report of such a speech, which could be read, but resembled no known language.

The phenomenon is not unprecedented. Nearly a hundred years ago there was a similar manifestation in London, under the preaching of the brilliant Edward Irving. Out of this came nothing good. There was confusion, fanaticism and charlatanism and finally heartbreak and the death of the pastor. Still more important and more useful to us in considering the present manifestation is the instance in the Corinthian church, which was submitted to the apostle Paul for his judgment. The apostle evidently considered the case carefully and his inspired words may well guide us in forming an opinion of the present phenomenon. The rule he laid down was reasonable and practical. Everything in the service of the church should, he said, be done to edification. The utterance of the unknown tongue might relieve the speaker, but it could not benefit the hearer. Therefore there should be an interpre present, to translate the speech uttered in the unkno tongue, and if no interpreter could be found, the m with the gift should keep silence in the public meeti (I. Cor. 14: 28). He did not forbid the speaking in t unknown tongue, but by stipulating that an interpre should be present, he gave a death-blow to the practi

We cannot do better than follow the apostolic rule the present conditions. Whether the person declaimi in the unknown tongue be a person under the influen of the Holy Spirit, or be merely a hysterical fana unconsciously deceiving himself, or be a charlatan see ing personal notoriety, let him find an interpreter w can explain his utterances. Then we can judge of th value. Failing in that, let him, as the apostle enjoi speak to himself and to God, but keep silence in publ

As the apostle Paul says, in writing on this very su ject: "God is not the author of confusion." His wor have been clear and intelligible to the hearer in whats ever language they were uttered. Moses understood the when they came to him out of the burning bush; Samu understood them when they were addressed to him in t darkness of the night; the prophets listened to them, a repeated them to the people. We have, therefore, go reason for doubt, when we are asked to believe that the confused, incomprehensible words, uttered by a hyste cal person, are a message from God. That is not Goo way of communicating with his people. Therefo we advise our readers who come in contact with the strange manifestations, to follow the injunction of t apostle John: "Beloved, believe not every spirit, b try the spirits whether they are of God: because ma false prophets are gone out into the world."

A Great Opportunity

NO one can really understand the newspaper co ment of the day, the sermon of the preacher, th brilliant rhetoric of the lecturer or orator, unless he h some means of looking up the sparkling quotations th are used and have such an effect. THE CHRISTI HERALD has provided the means in its superb volume Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts. Th average person hunts hours and weeks to find the co rect version of some favorite quotation or the name the author. Here in these books it is but a moment time and the full knowledge is before the reader.

To the preacher, the teacher, the man of business, th boy or girl at school, it will prove a tower of streng when they wish to enrich and reinforce their utteranc with the beautiful and "sublime thoughts" of the maste minds of all ages from the earliest days to our own tim All will find it of such value that they would not think parting with it at a thousand times the sacrificial pric at which the two volumes are now offered by Th CHRISTIAN HERALD.

For your own personal advantage, we call your atte tion to the full account of these superb books on anothe page of this issue. Only those who apply early can b sure of securing them, for books worth many dollars a not often sold at sixty cents. Express charges to be pai by the purchaser. The Sinking of the "Columbia"

AD intelligence was that sent out from San Francisco, Calif., on July 22. It was the story of a tragedy of the sea in which nearly a hundred lives had been lost. Two steamers had come into col- on a foggy night, and one of them had sunk with the passengers on board. The facts as gathered the confused reports are as follows: The steamer lumbia left San Francisco on July 20, bound north to land, Ore., having on board, it is believed, 188 engers and a crew of sixty. Shortly after midnight, she was off the coast of Mendocino County, fifteen from land, another steamer, the San Pedro, lumber- and bound south, loomed out of the fog. The smen of both vessels did their utmost to avert a col- n, but they had not seen their danger in time. The struck the Columbia fairly on the bow, making a through which the water rushed in a furious stream. steamer was clearly doomed, and the only hope for on board was in the boats. All accounts agree that coolest man on board was Captain Dorran, who stood bridge of his wounded steamer, directing the lower- of boats and the floating of rafts, while he sent his m ringing through the sleeping quarters to arouse the engers. By his orders, his brave crew were busy w, opening the valves of boilers and taking precau- to avoid an explosion. The only consolatory feature the calamity is the thought of that heroic captain and men quietly doing their duty, wing well that they were rificing their lives that the ers might have a chance of e- pe. Some of the crew and engers entered the boats, e jumped on the life rafts, others climbed on the mur- ous steamer that had done mischief. The steamer Elder, ch was near at hand, saw there was trouble and ed for the scene. She was ime to rescue a boat that ap- red likely to be swamped, to tow the Pedro, which disabled and loaded down h the survivors of the wreck, Eureka, the nearest port. n it was found that in all ety-seven passengers had n saved and thirty-four of the w. Later, news came that of the life-boats, with seven- n persons on board, had athered the storm. A faint e is cherished that perhaps er lives may have been saved outward-bound vessels. All the survivors speak of the oism of the captain, and of pathetic spectacle of him as stood alone on the bridge ving a good-by to the depart- passengers, for whose safety, as he said, he "had e his best." He might easily have saved himself, but voluntarily gave up his own life that others might be ed. It was a noble thing to do; he followed the ex- ple of Him of whom it was said:

le saved others, himself he cannot save. (Matt. 27: 42.)

the Holy Grail Found?

A cable message from England reports the discovery, a recess of an old well on the grounds of Glastonbury bbey, of a beautiful cup that some antiquarians believe ay prove to be the Holy Grail, celebrated in the legends King Arthur's court. There is an ancient tradition at Joseph of Arimathea, the rich Israelite in whose rden Christ's body was placed after the crucifixion ohn 19: 38), obtained the cup out of which Christ drank e wine at the last supper, and took it with him when went to preach the Gospel in England. It mysteriously sappeared, and as readers of Tennyson will remember, as eagerly sought by the knights of the round table. he cup now found in the well of the Abbey is unques- onably a very ancient vessel. It is of bluish-green glass, elicately inlaid with silver leaf. Mr. Pole, who found , has submitted his discovery to a meeting comprising armed prelates of the church, Professor Crookes, the minent scientist, and Whitelaw Reid, the American mbassador. The distinguished company listened to his ory with deep attention, but did not consider that the genuineness of the precious relic was absolutely proved. Professor Crookes was allowed to take it with him for a closer examination. Should he report in its favor, the cup will become an object of veneration to all Christendom. Many will be eager to see it, to whom Christ's words mean little or nothing:

Can ye drink of the cup that I drink of? and be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with? (Mark 10: 38).

A Child's Identity

A hotly contested dispute is being argued in the Supreme Court in Brooklyn, N.Y. It is over the identity of a girl of six years of age, who is being claimed by two rival families. According to the evidence on the one side, the child was born in Connecticut. Her mother was very poor and was eventually driven to accept the offer of a Brooklyn family to adopt the child. Legal papers were drawn up, and the girl baby, then only three months old, was formally consigned to the Brooklyn family. Some three or four years later, through the carelessness of a neighbor who offered to take the child out for an airing, the child was lost. Advertisements were published, the aid of the police was sought, but the foster-parents could not find her. Recently, a member of the Brooklyn family went to Coney Island, and passing down one of the streets there noticed a little girl, who she averred was the missing child. She did not speak to her, but returned home and took another member of the family to the home where she had seen the child. That second witness confirmed the testimony of the first and was sure that the little girl was the one so long sought. But when they claimed her, the man at whose house she was objected. He said she was his niece, the daughter of his deceased sister. The dispute has found its way to the courts, and the judge wishes he had the wisdom of Solomon to decide it rightly. It may be hoped that the child will not become vain in consequence of this struggle to possess her. Neither of the litigants can claim natural parentage, and neither can give her the advantage by adoption that she may gain by the inestimable privilege freely offered to her of becoming adopted into the family of God.

I will receive you and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. II. Cor. 6: 17, 18.

A Heroic Mother

Side by side in the Jewish Hospital in Brooklyn, N. Y., lie a mother and her six-year-old son, the former a voluntary sufferer for the benefit of the latter. About five months ago the child was severely scalded. His wounds healed, but it was noticed that there was a queer deformity of his neck, which caused him to hold his head to one side. The mother hoped that the boy's neck would straighten as he grew older, but on consulting a doctor she learned that the deformity would become worse, rather than better, with the lapse of time. "Could nothing be done for the boy?" the mother anxiously inquired. The surgeons told her that the only remedy was to cut away the skin that had been contracted by the scalds, and to replace it with new skin that must be obtained from a living person. The mother promptly offered her own cuticle for the purpose. Sufficient skin was taken from her body to graft the new growth on the boy's neck, and she and her child are now recovering slowly from the painful operation. She must love the child very much to be willing to endure such excruciating pain that he may be saved from deformity. It is from such instances of the love of a parent that we gain a faint idea of the love God has for his rebellious children, whose spiritual deformity could not be cured without suffering.

God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. (Rom. 5: 8.)

Imitation Gems

The jewelers of Maiden Lane, New York, have won a case against the United States Treasury. The custom-house officers are allowed to charge a duty of one fifth the value on imitations of precious stones, whether they are glass or other materials. On the genuine stones they must be satisfied with a duty of one-tenth the value. On a recent importation of imitation rubies, emeralds and sapphires, the officers demanded the higher rate. To this the importers, to whom they were sent, demurred, contending that the stones must be classed under what is known as the similitude clause of the law. By this clause any article not enumerated in the lists, must be classed with whatever it most closely resembles in material, appearance and intended use. The imitation stones are not glass, so cannot be classed as glass. There is nothing in the lists that they resemble so much as the genuine stones. The imitation ruby is made in the laboratory and is chemically identical with the rubies from Burma, and the emeralds and sapphires are composed of two pieces of quartz carefully cemented together with a little coloring matter between. The importers contend that they are constructed gems and should rank for assessment with the natural gems. The case has been appealed and at last the view of the importers is pronounced correct. So the imitation is to be classed with the genuine by the assessors. There are many people who would like to have a similar rule enforced as to character, and as a matter of fact the imitation does often pass muster as genuine in society and the church; but it is only for the time. God warns us that at the last he will separate the spurious from the genuine.

Ye are they which justify yourselves before men: but God knoweth your hearts: for that which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God. (Luke 16: 15.)

A Soul Disposed Of

The mental and spiritual condition of the Russian peasant was never more clearly indicated than it is by a document published in a current newspaper of St. Petersburg. The editor declares that he has seen the original document and he is confirmed by the testimony of the Deputy for the district of Tutionoff, in the province of Taurida. It runs as follows: "I, the undersigned, Nicolai Nicephorovitch, peasant, thirty-eight years of age, of the Dogmarovski district of Melitopol, have fallen into evil days. I am at the end of all my resources and hereby certify that I have sold for the sum of fifty rubles [about $26] my eternal salvation and place in the kingdom of Heaven to Makar Selenky." The signature is attested by one of the elders of the village council. As Nicolai could not give a clear title, Selenky had the worst of the bargain. Both men showed deplorable ignorance in supposing they could traffic in such matters. One may wish that persons too much enlightened to make such an open bargain were on their guard lest they too sell their souls for money.

What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? (Mark 8: 36.)

SPREADING THE LIGHT IN SALVADOR

IT affords us pleasure to acknowledge a gift of $257 from CHRISTIAN HERALD friends to help in our missionary work in the republic of Salvador, Central America. We consider this gift as a direct answer to prayer. For months, Mrs. Bender and I have felt the need of support for two native workers; for we are but two missionaries with one native helper to over a million of souls in one parish. With this gift in hand, we are now assured of the support of a native helper for one year, and we feel confident support will be forthcoming for another.

I have just returned from a fifteen days' trip, during which it was my privilege to visit three large cities and two villages. We have congregations in each place, averaging from twenty to sixty members each. Some of these places I am only able to visit twice a year; for there are ten other congregations that need oversight, and the work is still enlarging.

An Indian Ranch and Family, San Salvador

At Atiquizaya, I was invited to call on one of the wealthiest ladies in the city. I tried to make the way of salvation very plain to her, and she seemed much pleased. How glad she would be, she said, if her husband would only become converted, because he has been "such a wicked man." Her husband came to the meetings and was soon under deep conviction. He said that if his wife would accept, he would also accept the Gospel. They are not far from the kingdom. The mother of this lady was arranging an altar at the time for the Corpus Christi festival. Some one ran to the priest and told him, "The missionary is preaching in Mercedes' house." He immediately sent up word, demanding an explanation of her why she allowed the missionary to preach in her house. She sent back word saying that I had simply called on a visit. If he was not pleased, she added, she would have the altar taken down immediately. He replied, rather apologetically, that it was all right and to leave the altar. Before leaving the city, I called at the house again and soon a tray of ice cream was sent in for us by the priest, who sought in this way to appease his patron, lest she should get disgusted with him and turn Protestant.

At one of the villages visited, there were several who were undecided. Among them was one who confessed that he desired to be saved, yet his heart would say, "No; not yet." He said there seemed to be a power to keep him from deciding. On the last evening, I asked him if he would there and then accept Christ. He hesitated, with tears in his eyes, and finally said, "Yes." He threw his arms around me, the power of evil was broken and he went out a saved man.

On this same trip, we learned of another man being saved through reading the Way to God, in Spanish. I believe there are many redeemed ones who have come to a knowledge of Christ through the gift of some of these books by CHRISTIAN H[illegible] readers. I have been able to s[illegible] them all along the way on my [illegible] These booklets are an effectual [illegible] of getting the truth to these pe[illegible] We have three colporteurs who [illegible] part of their time to the distrib[illegible] of religious books. All the Men Emigrated

The lure of the United States as a land of opportunity and wealth has brought about a curious [illegible] of affairs in the little village of Kerisova, near Lu[illegible], near Budapest, Hungary, which at the last ce[illegible] had a population of 3,500. One by one the [illegible] residents of Kerisova felt the call across the wa[illegible], and they emigrated in batches until the mayor [illegible] the only adult male to remain in the village. Fin[illegible] he also succumbed to the reports of good wages [illegible] golden chances in America sent back by his fel[illegible] townsmen, and, packing his trunk, made his wa[illegible] to the emigrant ship at Fiume, and was soon on [illegible] ocean with his face turned to the land of promise.

As a result of this exodus of men, the women of Kerisova have just elected a young woman to [illegible] place of mayor, and other women residents [illegible] been elected to fill the remainder of the munici[illegible] offices.

This is a new and altogether unprecedented stat[illegible] of affairs. The statutes of Hungary provide that no [illegible] male shall hold public office, and according to [illegible] letter of the law the presence of the women in o[illegible] is illegal. Whether the new mayor will stay o[illegible] remains to be seen.

AUNT HANNAH'S QUILT

"I'VE come to talk 'bout that quilt," said Aunt Hannah, as she came up and sat down on the piazza where I was resting after the heat of a mid-summer's day. "This hot weather makes me feel that I must hurry up and git the money to send some more children out to Mont-Lawn. I brought some patterns for the squares. There's the oak-leaf, an' the basket, an' the friendship, an' the sunrise. You see, I want some centres for twenty-five-cent names, and some corners for ten-cent ones, and they must be white an' the rest of the squares will be pink an' light green, I guess. I'm goin' to git one of the traders to give the white, an' another the green, an' another the pink, an' I shall try hard to get the cotton an' linin' throwed in too. I mean to have a quilt that'll sell for somethin' han'some!"

Having settled on the pattern, Aunt Hannah took her departure. I soon found she had gone into this campaign to win. The girls were writing to their friends, soliciting names, and had begun a thorough canvass of the village; and there was quite a friendly rivalry as to who should secure the most names.

I had promised to help her in cutting out the blocks, and she soon appeared with the material in hand.

"You see," said she, "quiltin's ain't common nowadays, and I can't trust everybody to take stitches in this quilt. There's about six or eight women I can trust, an' I'll invite them to my house to quilt it, an' the rest I'll ask to get up the supper. I'll have an old-fashioned supper, same's we hear of. I've got a lot of old-fashioned dishes from my two grandmothers the rest didn't care for them an' I can use the tin lantern my great-gran'ther Frost used more'n a hundred years ago. I've got caps and capes for the girls to dress up in, an' they say they'll call it a Colonial tea. Of course, the young men'll come, an' I think we'll get out quite a crowd. Once git them blessed girls started, an' they're a hull team. I must go home now an' sew them squares."

I began to believe in the enterprise myself, now that I saw how the general had laid out her campaign and was preparing for a victory.

The next day I ran in, and Aunt Hannah showed me the quilt, which she had sewed with the utmost exactness. It was a beauty and no mistake. One lady told her she had partly enough cotton, and another said she had enough to make up the amount needed. She had collected fifteen cents towards the lining and I gave her enough to make up the rest. She said the girls were succeeding finely in securing names, and she was planning to have the quilting right away and asked what I thought about a programme.

I told her we could easily get one from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

"So we can," said she. "There's that poem, 'The Sick Child an' Mont-Lawn,' an' we'll have a description of the place too. Then we can sing Sunshine songs an' have somethin' 'bout old times. That'll do firstrate. I'll appoint a committee right away."

Soon the day for the quilting arrived, and all but one of the invited ladies assembled at Aunt Hannah's cottage. The quilt was already in the frame, and she proceeded to do the "marking," which was done by snapping a cord dusted with chalk. By five o'clock it was ready to "shake," according to the old-time custom. Then the upper part was hemmed over and it was pronounced finished.

In the evening, all hands assembled at the hall to partake of the Colonial tea. The quilt, well covered with names, hung on the wall and received many admiring glances. The waiters, in quaint costumes, attracted much attention and dropped many a courtesy in acknowledgment of the compliments they received. Aunt Hannah was in her element, and with her pink cheeks and the sparkle in her eyes, looked really beautiful.

The supper was excellent and the [illegible]gramme passed off well. Then a b[illegible] social time was enjoyed. A gentlem[illegible] who was spending the summer in to[illegible], and whose daughter, Ethel, had ente[illegible] into the affair with much enthusia[illegible], offered ten dollars for the quilt. As t[illegible] was much more than was expected it w[illegible] thankfully accepted. It was found t[illegible] the amount collected on the names [illegible] reached the sum of forty-one dollars a[illegible] sixty cents, and the amount taken at [illegible] tables was seven dollars and ten cen[illegible], after deducting all necessary expens[illegible]. In all, fifty-eight dollars and seve[illegible] cents, to which one dollar and thir[illegible] cents were promptly added. Wh[illegible] Aunt Hannah announced that the sum [illegible] sixty dollars had been raised, th[illegible] cheers were given with a will.

"Now how was this thing done?" ask[illegible] the people. "Well, you see, I had j[illegible] sixty-four squares an' each centre w[illegible] twenty-five cents, an' each corner w[illegible] ten cents, so each square was sixty-f[illegible] cents. That, with the supper and t[illegible] price of the quilt, make it. An' now j[illegible] think! twenty poor, starved childr[illegible] some of them sick and others lame, c[illegible] have the best time of all their liv[illegible] Let's sing, 'Praise God, from whom [illegible] blessings flow.'"

MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

ON THE COOL HOME VERANDA

About Paying the Doctor

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THREE friends were sitting one afternoon on the home veranda engaged in conversation on topics such as women generally enjoy. They had touched on Mrs. Winship's dismay at the idea of Marjory's taking whooping cough, which was said to be in the neighborhood. Mrs. Lansing and Mrs. Deyo both affirmed that for their part they greatly preferred letting children have whooping cough in summer, and being done with it, to running the risk of its attacking them in the fall. "Oh," said Mrs. Winship, "it is a dreadful disease and Marjory is a delicate child. My cousin Fanny's daughter Jane was never robust after she had the whooping-cough, and I always thought it undermined her constitution, so that she could not make a good fight against pneumonia, of which she died before she was thirty. I shall do my utmost to prevent Marjory's taking any of the children's diseases. Dr. Payton told my husband this every child started with about the same amount of physical capital and that every attack of illness took away something from the reserve of vitality that should last a lifetime of the ordinary length. So I am guarding Marjory as best I can."

"Well, dear," remarked Mrs. Deyo, "you have only the one child and I have six. I simply can't feel about them as you do about your one. What a comfort it is to know that we have a good doctor within sound of the telephone, and that, on the whole, this suburb is well drained and quite a healthy place, free from malaria and mosquitoes. My sister Eunice lives in a mosquito-haunted country, and though she has every luxury that money can buy, I would not change places with her for anything. Mosquitoes are a worse plague than any the Egyptians had to bear when Moses had that stubborn tussle with Pharaoh."

At this moment the gate beyond the flower borders swung open with a click, and two neighbors walked in and seated themselves sociably with the group on the veranda. Mrs. Winship's home was a rallying place for her friends, and on the way from the main or the Centre, where the shops were, they often dropped in the late afternoon for a casual chat. One of the newcomers was Mrs. Payton, whose husband was the doctor already mentioned, the other Mrs. Ellory, the minister's wife. As they seated themselves Mrs. Winship's maid came out with tall glasses of lemonade in which ice tinkled pleasantly, and Marjory brought a plate of nut cake. Something to nibble and something to sip are great promoters of conversation. As the five ladies chatted gaily an automobile rushed by, carrying a load of handsomely dressed people, who smiled and waved their hands as their car whirled along the highway. A shadow crossed the sweet face of Mrs. Payton. "The Golightlys have added a motor-car to their other luxuries," said Mrs. Deyo. "Mr. Golightly has made a fortune in the last year, I am told, and as if that were not enough, he has just received a large legacy under his great-aunt's will."

"What is the matter, Mrs. Payton?"

"Oh, nothing," answered that lady, "only I wish if they have so much money the Golightlys would pay my husband. Dr. Payton would be angry if he knew I mentioned it, but they owe him an immense bill now, and it keeps running on and adding up and it never occurs to them that a poor country doctor may be in need of funds. You remember how long Edith Golightly was ill with typhoid a year and a half ago? Well, that bill is not settled yet. The poor patients often pay the doctor more promptly than the rich ones, and it takes a lot of Christian grace for me to wear my old taffeta dress darned in a dozen places and to do without music lessons for Harry, when everything would be easy if the Golightlys and people like them would only pay the doctor. It is not professional to dun, and I suppose I must be discreet and hold my tongue. But this new motor-car disturbs my composure."

Very soon the group dispersed leaving Mrs. Winship alone with Marjory on the veranda. "Mother, dear," inquired the child, "why do you suppose people forget to pay the doctor when they are so ready to pay the butcher and the grocer?" For a girl of thirteen Marjory was observing and took note more critically than most children, of what went on around her.

"My dear," said the mother, "when people are ill and in trouble, their first thought is to send for a physician. They want him in haste, and if there is extreme illness they want him often. No one else is so welcome. They scan his face trying to read in it what hope there is for their dear one, and they obey him as sailors obey a captain or soldiers a commander-in-chief. But once they are well, at least one-third of a doctor's patients postpone the day of reckoning and think his bill can be settled at any future season convenient to them. I have known intimately several doctors' wives, and they tell the same story that Mrs. Payton does. In fact, a great many people grudge paying the doctor, although they do not hesitate to spend their money freely in other directions."

Marjory picked up her book and went in-doors. It was too late for reading. In the door-way she turned. "Mother," she said, "if I were a doctor I think I would collect my fee every time I called. When you took me to the oculist you paid him on the spot."

"One does that with specialists," was the mother's reply, "but a specialist is not a family doctor."

A SUMMER HOLIDAY IN AMSTERDAM

THE picturesque old Dutch city has many sights to interest the tourists from lands afar. Happy is the visitor who chances on a summer holiday, when the children swarm dressed for the fete, and old and young alike are in gala attire and gala spirits. The good people of Holland have many virtues, among which thrift, courage, honesty and love of home predominate. It goes without saying that the good wives of Holland adore cleanliness, and the children are spotless as well as beautiful in their holiday procession.

The Cradle Roll

The cradle roll of the missionary society is one of its most interesting adjuncts. For the carrying on of beneficent enterprises we must look to the generation that is coming on the stage. Mothers cannot too early begin the initiation of their little ones in those things that concern the uplifting of humanity. If anybody supposes it foolish to enter the name of tiny Dorothy or William on the list of the junior mission band, let her consider for an instant how swiftly the babies grow and how short a space there really is in family life between the first year and the tenth. Is it too much to say that the first decade of life stamps the character for every subsequent year up to middle life and old age? The cradle roll with the little contributions given by loving mothers from the baby hands, will later swell the large aggregate of missionary gifts.

Everyone may not know it, but there are men and women to-day who take pains to enter the name of infant children on the college rolls, so that their own Alma Mater may receive their boys and girls eighteen or twenty years hence. Few of the great universities and splendidly endowed women's colleges to-day are without a cradle roll from which future graduates will be gathered.

Unless the ranks of society and the professions are recruited from the rising generation, the world must slip back into primitive barbarism, a conclusion not to be entertained for a moment. The cradle roll of Christendom is its galaxy of hope for the better day that is advancing.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—IRENE. As a rule, marriages are likely to be happier if made between people of the same race and of similar tastes and education. Yet one may marry an Indian or a Chinaman or anybody else whom she likes and respects without violation of law. Aunt Prudence does not advise it, however. Are there not enough good Americans in this land without going beyond the pale to choose a husband?

—H. C. N. You ask whether the Norwegians as a nation are considered higher and better than the Swedish. Both nations stand equally high in a racial and physical sense. Inquire at the nearest library for any books by William O. Stoddard and Kirk Monroe. Both writers have a list of wide-awake stories that boys under twelve enjoy.

—E. H. You ask me to suggest a suitable gift at Christmas for a Sunday School class of twelve boys. Something depends on their ages. Boys between ten and fourteen will be best pleased with a good book. I do not advise for them a child's book, but rather a book of travel or adventure. Kirk Monroe's For the Mikado, or Ralph Connor's Glengarry School-days would suit most boys. A knife or a fountain pen is a present that is sure to please the average boy.

—Ross. The best way in which a young woman of thirty engaged during the day in her own support can improve her education will be this: Let her join an evening class at a Settlement, or a Young Women's Christian Association, and study with others. If she is unable to do this, let her take up at home the study of American history. She will find this interesting, and by reading an hour every night and making notes of what she reads, she will enlarge her mental horizon and add to her vocabulary.

THE DAY OF ATONEMENT

International Sunday School Lesson for August 18

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IT is the tenth day of the Jewish new year. The great Day of Atonement is about to be celebrated for the first time according to the law given by God to Moses. The people are assembled in the doors of their tents, while all eyes are turned toward the Tabernacle. The usual morning sacrifices have been offered, and Aaron, the high priest, has laid aside his golden clothes, and is now attired instead in pure white garments, which signify that the wearer is representing Jehovah, not as ordinarily in the fulness of his attributes, but, in accordance with the peculiar character of the day, in the splendor of his holiness. But unlike Jehovah, Aaron is a sinful man, as also are his sons, who are to assist him in the services. A bullock is brought to the great brazen altar, and Aaron slays it there as a sacrifice for his sins and the sins of his sons. He puts the blood of the bullock in a dish and goes into the Tabernacle, into the very Holy of Holies, which he may enter only on Atonement Day. He sprinkles the blood seven times upon the mercy-seat, where God manifests himself continually in the Shekinah fire between the cherubim. He burns incense upon the golden altar as a prayer of praise to God, that his sins are forgiven and the sins of his sons.

The Two Goats

Aaron comes out of the Tabernacle and stands in the court. Two goats are brought to him; one he slays as a sacrifice for the sins of his people. He puts the blood of the goat in a dish, goes into the Tabernacle, into the Holy of Holies again, and sprinkles the blood of the goat seven times upon the mercy-seat. And so not only Aaron and his sons and all of the people, but the Tabernacle itself is cleansed. Aaron stands again in the courtyard, and takes some of the blood of the bullock and also of the goat, reserved for this purpose, and puts it upon the four corners of the great altar, so that it also may be cleansed. Aaron then lays his hands upon the head of the living goat, after which he calls a man to take it far off into the desert, by which act he says to the people: God has laid your sins on a substitute who "bears away the sins of the world." Dr. Jacob Meyer explains "azazel as a small oasis, within the wilderness, or 'cut off or separated from the entire area of the desert.' Thither goat number two, laden with the sins of the entire congregation of Israel, and therefore the personification, as it were, of all possible sins, iniquities and transgressions, was banished for life, the dreariness and barrenness of the surrounding wilderness preventing an escape. There are several large oases in the west of Egypt, to which, under the Roman Empire, criminals of state were banished; but smaller ones—spots producing vegetation — pleasantly interrupt the continuity of the gloomy solitude of the desert in the east of Egypt. Their proper location is, of course, known only to men who frequently travel through the desert: it is for this reason that the goat (the substitute criminal for all Israel) was to be sent to such a 'small oasis' (azazel) by a man who had passed through that solitude 'many a time,' wherefore he is surnamed in Hebrew (v. 21) itti: Authorized Version, 'a fit man,' 'a man of opportunity'; Revised Version, 'a man that is in readiness' or (margin) 'appointed.'"

A Day of Consecration

The people, being forgiven by God, straightway asked forgiveness of each other also, for wrongs they had done. Aaron then went into the Tabernacle and changed his white garments for his golden clothes, and thus arrayed stood again in the court of the Tabernacle, the people still standing in the doors of their tents. A live bullock and a live ram were now brought to Aaron. They were bound and laid upon the altar and burned before the Lord as a whole burnt offering, by which Aaron and the people consecrated themselves wholly to God (Lev. 1 : 4; Rom. 12:1).

Lessons of the Day

The man who had led off the scapegoat into the wilderness came back, and was purified by washing himself and his clothes. Aaron called men to cleanse the court of the Tabernacle by carrying away the remains of the sacrifices, after which the men who had done so washed themselves and their clothes. Thus the great Atonement Day ended, to be celebrated anew year after year, till its meaning was fulfilled at the Cross, where we "behold the Lamb of God that beareth away the sins of the world."

The Day of Atonement plainly teaches: 1. That sin deserves death. 2. That a substitute will be accepted. 3. We should forgive as we are forgiven. 4. Forgiveness should be followed by consecration.

"The wages of sin is death." That is the instinctive confession of the human heart in all lands, in the bleeding sacrifices of nearly all religions. In India the exceeding sinfulness of sin is proclaimed by sacrifices on every side. In China they are more rare, but in the highest ceremony of Confucianism, the prayer of the Emperor for his people under the open sky at the high altar, a sacrifice is offered. I once heard a converted Jew reproach his people as having an atonement day with no atonement, for except in a few rare instances where very conservative Jews in Russia offer a fowl, the Day of Atonement is observed to-day with the old sacrifices omitted and the new sacrifice of Christ rejected. The self-tortures of many religions are also a sad confession that sin against God calls for blood atonement.

Strange to say, it is in so-called Christian lands that we are most likely to meet those who show no sense of sin.

A Repentant Child

A brother and sister were playing in the dining room, when their mother set a basket of cakes on the table.

"Come here, Dorothy," said her mother. "I want you a moment." Dorothy ran after her mother, and Willie was left alone. He looked longingly at the cakes. "She has never counted them," said a voice in his ear. "She will not miss one." "But God counts," came another voice. Willie, however, put out his hand now and took a cake and ate it rapidly, listening the while for his mother's step. When he had finished, Willie ran out into the garden. The flowers and sky and birds and sun had not changed, but Willie had changed. He had become a thief. Sin had destroyed his happiness.

A Guilty Conscience

"Oh, Willie, here you are!" cried Dorothy, bounding round the corner of the house. "I have been looking for you everywhere. Tea's ready." "I don't want any tea," replied Willie. The fact was, Willie was afraid to meet his father and mother. It seemed to him that, if his mother looked into his eyes, she would know in a moment that he had taken the cake. "What is the matter with you?" she asked. "I'm all right, I tell you," said Willie. Then to show he was all right, Willie put up his arm and began to cry. Almost immediately, however, he wiped his eyes, jumped up and ran away. Dorothy went in and told her mother. Mrs. Frankham was quite alarmed. "I do hope he is not taking measles," she said, anxiously. As she spoke, Willie came in and threw himself into a chair. Throughout tea and during the rest of the day Willie was in such a strange mood that Mrs. Frankham felt sure he must be sickening for measles. "If he is not better to-morrow, I shall send for the doctor," she said to herself. The poor boy was really getting more and more miserable. Twenty times he made up his mind to tell mother and be done with it, and twenty times he changed his mind. At length bed-time came. Then Willie came back to his mother and began to cry. He was really so unhappy that he felt he must confess his fault, and yet he could not begin.

God's Forgiveness

"What is the matter, dearie?" asked mother, stroking the boy's head. It all came out at last, between the sobs, and Willie began to feel happier. The tale was a sad one, and difficult to tell, but mother listened patiently until it was all told. "I am so glad you have told me," said she; then, softly, "I forgive you, darling. But we must ask God to forgive you. Against him you have really sinned."

"The goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a solitary land"

Mrs. Frankham knelt and prayed earnestly that God would pardon her boy. "Mother," said Willie, "does count the cakes?" Mother paused considered. "Yes, dear, he does. He that he numbers the hairs of your hea "I thought he must, because someth inside me said, when I was taking the c that God counts. Now I know he do With that Willie undressed and lai flushed little face on the pillow, an mother kissed him, he fell asleep, ha in God's forgiveness.

A Heroic Nurse

As the illustrations of the cross give advance in bleeding sacrifices, where beast, as the sinner's substitute, fell short of the truth, but were neverthe helpful, so all human illustrations of s sacrifice for the sake of friends, while t fail to picture adequately that while were yet sinners, Christ died for us, help us to understand the supreme s sacrifice.

In 1770 Santo Domingo was visited by earthquake scarcely less severe than t of San Francisco. In Port-au-Prince, chief town, resided a rich French fam After the first sudden shock, fath mother, children and servants had b able to effect exit from their totter house, all except a negress in charge of baby boy fast asleep on the top floor. U stairs the faithful nurse rushed to ca baby down, when—just on point of seizing him—a sec and still more terrific shock f lowed, the entire staircase fall in. What should she do? Anxi only for the boy, and totally gardless of herself, with the wh muslin folds of her long, lo robe she instantly covered tiny sleeper, and then, bend over him, formed by her o person a complete protecti arch. Again and yet again, "fr turret to foundation stone," house shook. The negress k her post. You anticipate pathetic sequel; a few hours lat amid heaps of debris, the sear party discovered the heroic wo an about to expire—she pass away almost immediately—b on lifting the white robe wh covered the dear child, th found the sweet, unconsci little one perfectly safe and w Lovely the picture!

Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress;
'Midst flaming worlds in these array
With joy shall I lift up my head.

Martin Luther, in one of conflicts with the devil, was ask by the arch-enemy if he felt sins forgiven. "No," said great reformer, "I don't f that they are forgiven, but know they are, because God sa so in his Word." Paul did n say, "Believe on the Lord Jes Christ, and thou shalt feel saved," b "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, a thou shalt be saved." Ask that m whose debt was paid by his brother, "I you feel that your debt is paid?" "No is the reply, "I don't feel that it is paid. know from this receipt that it is paid, a I feel happy because I know it is paid."

Entire Consecration

The whole burnt offering, in which t forgiven sinner, who had previously offer a sin offering, presented a whole and pe fect animal living and dying to the Lor represented such a dedication of himse to God.

The ceremony of the anointing of t ear, thumb, and great toe with the blo of consecration or cleansing signified (E 29 : 20; Lev. 8 : 23, 24) also the dev tion of the person wholly, heartily, and all his powers, to hearing and doing t commands of the Lord, and walking in h ways. "Feet Wanted" was the sign p up in the window of a facetious sh dealer. God wants feet to walk even Christ walked, which is the chief theme the Epistle to the Ephesians. And in Re elation the call is for spiritual ears "hear what the Spirit saith." And G also calls for hands that will lift up othe as Peter did at the Beautiful Gate.

GABRIELLE

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

By Isabella MacFarlane

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of a Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on the father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but leaves a note on the fly-leaf of a psalm book explaining his plight. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. With her cousin Rosalie she attends the festival of the crowning of the Rosiere. While there, Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Repulsed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover.

"HIS poor father is heartbroken over the matter. He cannot forgive himself for having come back, and exposed his son to this danger," said David.

"Is there no hope of his return?" said Cousin Pauline. "Is it for life?"

"Alas! yes. It is for life. True, galley slaves sometimes escape, but are almost always taken again."

"Never to see him again!—never to hear from him—to know that he is living in suffering, yet be wholly unable to communicate with him or to help him—oh, father, how can I bear it?" said Gabrielle, wringing her hands.

"The only help we can give him, my child, is to pray for him," said her father, gravely. "And now I must go and have my horse fed at the stabler's, that I may start in good time on my return; for I dare not leave the family all night with those ruffianly soldiers in the house."

"Dear father, take me home with you," pleaded Gabrielle; "I feel as if I would be comforted if I could lay my head on my mother's breast, and weep there."

"No, my daughter, it cannot be. There is more need than ever for you to remain here. I have been laying secret plans to leave La Rochelle on an English ship as soon as the dragoons vacate the house. It will be hard enough to get the rest of the family smuggled on board. I have another plan for you, which I shall unfold to you by and by."

He then went to attend to his horse, while good Cousin Pauline, assisted by the girls, hastened to prepare a savory pot-au-feu, with which to fortify his brother man for the homeward journey.

On his return, he detailed to his daughter some of the miseries that had fallen on the city since she left—hoping that the tale of others' woes might in some degree lighten the burden of her own.

"The dragoons," said he, "are in almost every house. The streets are full of them. Thousands of our people have fled to other lands. Thousands of others—weak-kneed brethren, I call them—have recanted, securing life and property at the cost of peace of conscience. Some of the people are so terrified, that if they see a soldier in the street with a paper in his hand, they run to him, and declare their willingness to sign their recantation."

"How pitiful!" said she.

"Our cousins, Theodore and Clement, hold out bravely. I asked them to join us in our project of emigrating, but they do not feel inclined to take that step as yet, whatever they may do later. But I have a woful story to tell of Cousin Dominique."

"What of him?"

"It seems that on his return journey to Paris, after the birthday fête, he was waylaid by some marauding soldiers, who stripped him of his money-belt, his riding-coat, and his horse, and then, presenting a gun in the muzzle of which was fastened a crucifix, commanded him to adore the emblem, or receive the bullet that lay behind it! The ordeal was too great. Poor Cousin Dominique succumbed. And he is now one of those compulsory converts made in such numbers by our 'booted missionaires,' as they are called. But they did not give him back his money-belt, or his riding-coat, or his horse; and, having no money to hire another horse, he had to foot it the rest of the way."

"Has our house been much injured by the soldiers?"

"Oh, yes. The doors are defaced and splintered by being kicked open or shut by heavy boots; the windows are smashed by pistol bullets; the tall Venetian mirror that your mother thought so much of has a great spreading star in the centre, caused by a shot fired at it in wanton mischief. And many other things I could tell you. But I see by the lengthening shadows that it is time for me to take the road."

Gabrielle's grief broke out afresh when the moment of parting came. But seeing that she distressed her father and was causing him to belate himself in his anxiety to comfort her, she controlled herself, and was able even to give him a parting smile, as she sent message after message to mother, and grandmother, and Jeanne, and Marie, and Raoul—and old Christine.

Then he rode away, and left her alone with her burden. And yet not alone, for the ever-present Burden-Bearer was with her, to sustain and comfort her.

Before leaving, David had explained to her his plan for her escape, which will appear in the sequel.

"Gabrielle shook her head. 'It cannot be, Captain Girard,' she said"

CHAPTER VIII

THE PATHWAY IN THE WOOD

A LITTLE way beyond the town lay a piece of woods, through which a foot-path had been formed by the wood-cutters, as they passed to and from their work. The branches meeting overhead formed a leafy arcade, and the edges of the path were gemmed with the smaller blossoms of the woods, the scarlet pimpernel, the cowslip, the violet.

On the further side of the wood stood the cot—little better than a hovel—of Pierre Duval, the blind father of the girl who had won the rose crown. He had been a wood-cutter, but having been caught one day in a heavy thunderstorm, had been struck by a bolt that left him stone blind.

On either side of the door, against the clay walls of the cottage, was placed a seat or bench of mossy turf, which afforded a very comfortable resting-place.

This pathway in the wood was a favorite resort of Gabrielle, and when she reached Pierre's cottage she would frequently stop to rest on one of the turf seats, while the blind man occupied the other, and enter into conversation with him.

Here he spent the live-long day alone, while his daughter toiled in the field, reaping, binding, digging, or whatever work the season called for. He had learned to braid mats of rushes, by which he earned a few sous; but the pulling of the rushes added to the labors of the hard-working Claire, for they grew in marshy places where it would not have been safe for him to go.

About a week after her father's visit, Gabrielle took her way to the pathway in the wood; for while she appreciated the sympathy of her kind cousins, she wanted to be alone with her sorrow. Though she felt that her life had been made desolate, she had borne up bravely under the blow. But now, as she recalled to mind what she had heard and read of the sufferings of the galley slave, the chains, the brutal lash, the never-resting oar, she was obliged to stay her faltering steps, sit down by the wayside, and give vent to her feelings.

When she reached the hut, she found the old man seated as usual on the turf seat.

As soon as she greeted him, the sensitive ear of the blind man knew that something was amiss.

"What is the matter, Ma'mselle?" he said. "There are tears in your voice."

"A great misfortune has befallen a dear friend of mine. I cannot choose but weep when I think of him."

"Is he blind?" said Pierre, as if that were the ne plus ultra of misfortune.

"No, oh, no. He is not blind."

"Is he dead?"

"No! He still lives."

"Then why do you weep?"

"Because we are parted—perhaps forever; and because he has to endure the most terrible sufferings."

"Forever is a long word, Mam'selle; and as for suffering—the back is always fitted to the burden. Whatever may be your friend's trouble, depend upon it, God will make it up to him in some way. He took away my eyesight, but he gave me my daughter Claire; and Claire herself—she has to work very hard, but she has won the rose crown, and is the happiest girl in this town."

Somehow, the blind old man's simple faith in the law of compensation did Gabrielle good. For the first time since she had heard the fatal tidings, a glimmering of hope and encouragement sprang up in her heart. Perhaps Louis would escape. Perhaps he would be pardoned (as it is called when a guiltless man is set at liberty); perhaps something, she knew not what, would happen, and her lover be restored to her.

After exchanging a few more words with Pierre, and leaving a small gratuity in his hand, she left him.

When she had gone about a third of the way on her return, she perceived a man approaching from the opposite direction.

On a nearer view, she saw it was Captain Girard.

"You see I have come again," was his greeting. "I called at your cousin's house, and was directed by the young lady—the pretty Rosalie—where to find you. But what is wrong with you? You seem disordered. You are pale, and your eyes look as if you had been weeping."

"I have lost a dear friend," said Gabrielle, thinking it unnecessary to enter into particulars.

"Ah, that is sad," said he, in a tone of commiseration, thinking she spoke of some one who had died.

"But why, Captain Girard, do you persist in seeking me? Why do you come here?"

"Why? Because I cannot stay away. Because I love you, Gabrielle de Bonnefoy."

He made a step towards her, and tried to take her hand, but Gabrielle drew back with flushed cheek and flashing eyes, and put both her hands behind her back.

"Don't touch me!" she said. "Don't dare to touch me!"

"What! Do you think there is pollution in my touch?" cried he, firing up.

"Oh, no, you are mistaken. It is not that I regard you with suspicion, or doubt your honor; but my hand is pledged to one whom I love better than my life, and no other man shall touch it with hand or lip of love."

Questions and Answers

L. B. Neche, S. D. Had Moses two wives, as stated in Josephus, or one as mentioned in the Bible?

Tradition states that he first married Tharbis, daughter of the King of Ethiopia (see Josephus). Next he married Zipporah (see Ex. 2: 21). There is a Cushite wife mentioned in Num. 12: 1, but this may refer either to Zipporah herself or to a third wife, married after Zipporah's death.

In a letter from Missionary C. B. Titus, Hsian-fu, China, this pathetic incident is told:

One day the feeblest, most pitiful baby cry reached my ears. Turning to see from whence it came, there, huddled together by the building, were four small children, one, but an infant, buttoned underneath the older boy's coat next his warm breast, its tiny feet protruding below the coat, exposed to the wind, while its little skeleton head lay on the boy's neck, its eyes closed, apparently oblivious to things without: but the feeble wail told all too plainly of the unsatisfied want and acute distress within. I asked for the mother. "We have no mother or father," said the boy. "Our mother went away five days ago to get food, and never came back." Pitiful orphans! Wandering waifs! What could I do? The baby needed milk and we had only flour to give. I besought the Lord of all; then went out and filled the "beggar" bowl with copper coin. Eagerly the elder boy grasped it, and with his pitiful charge and smaller brother and sister toddled slowly down the street. I was relieved to see an elderly woman come out and take the smallest toddler in her arms; and then they all disappeared through a gateway of the market town. This cry of the babies was heard at last on the other side of the world, for shortly afterward, when $50.00 was cabled from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the laconic message specified, "$5.00 to feed the babies." All honor to the Christian motherhood of America! As a single instance of relief by this fund, we hear that the little daughter of Dr. Woods fed from a nursing bottle fifteen babies, which their poor mothers brought to her every day.

H. L. B., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. 1. Is it the right way to worship God and pray to him as though he were a man and believing him as such? 2. Is there any proof that the pictures that represent Christ as he was on earth are perfect likenesses of him?

1. Anthropomorphism, or the representation of divinity under human form, was expressly forbidden under the Hebrew law (Ex. 22: 4, 5). The Egyptians and Greeks, however, gave to deity human form and attributes. Jews, Christians, and even Mohammedans, revere God as a spirit and reject all representations of him in human form. Yet, we find in all three religions references to God (to his eye, his hand, his heart, etc.) as though he had the form and passions of men; yet these are usually mere figures of speech. It would almost seem as though, owing to our human limitations, we are unable wholly to divest religion of this error, because no other conception of God is possible through human senses. 2. None. A cameo, said to have been engraved in the time of Tiberius, is accepted by many as being probably the nearest approach to a likeness of the Saviour, but even that is doubtful.

Mrs. C. H. A., Belmont, N. H., writes:

Allow me to correct a mistake. Benjamin Randall, founder of the Free Baptist denomination, was a native of New Durham, N. H., instead of Durham. The towns are quite a distance apart.

G. S. C., Watson's Bay, Canada. 1. Has phrenology become a science? 2. To what extent are phrenologists to be relied upon?

1. No, it is not a recognized science. 2. It is not possible to read or forecast character by the general conformation of the head, or what professional phrenologists call the "bumps." Of course, a well-shaped, normal head is to be distinguished from a weak, abnormal development; but many of the greatest minds the world has known would have been pronounced poor or indifferent, if judged by the average phrenological methods.

W. K. Q., Spencer, N. C. 1. What did Job mean by the expression, "In my flesh I shall see God" (Job 19: 26)? 2. Is there any authority in Scripture for believing that those who die impenitent will ultimately be saved? 3. If God is almighty and beneficent, why does he permit such calamities as the famine in China to take place?

1. If you look to the Revised Version you will find that there was an error in translation which is there corrected. The phrase should be "without my flesh shall I see God." The common theory was that death ended all, and that if a man was not vindicated in this life, he never would be. Job says that though he might die and worms eat his flesh, yet without his flesh he would see God. 2. There are some passages of doubtful meaning that are sometimes quoted as authority, but no man with any regard for his eternal safety would rely upon them. A man's duty is to repent now, not to look for authority for hoping he may be saved after death. 3. If God interfered to avert natural calamities, this would be a chaotic world. He does not promise to do so. He has established natural laws which we are to observe and study. That they involve trouble as well as benefit is inevitable. The fire that warms us and serves us, may burn down the house. We must not accuse God of negligence. Our duty is to relieve the sufferer when it is in our power. Our subscribers, in this very instance, have by their gifts saved nearly a million lives. This is better than theorizing about God's duty in the matter.

J. J. L., National Soldiers' Home, Danville, Ill. Can you give me some information in regard to the great Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine, now in process of erection in New York City? When were the foundations laid, how far has it progressed, and what is the length of time estimated to finish it, and at what cost?

The cathedral was begun in 1885. The foundations and crypt are completed, also the back of the choir and one of the great arches. Several of the main pillars have been installed. When the cathedral is completed it will be over three hundred feet high. At the present rate of construction it will take fifty years more to complete the structure. Its estimated cost is six millions.

W. M., Memphis, Tenn. What is the nature and extent of the proposed change in Congo rule?

By an agreement concluded between the Belgian and Congo governments on July 12, the terms are outlined upon which the rule of King Leopold as personal sovereign and owner of the Congo will cease, and the Free State will pass under the control of Belgium. This proposed change, little more than nominal though it may seem on the surface, has in it the possibilities of a reform which may prove to be of decided benefit to the much-abused native tribes of the Congo. It was favored by the United States and British governments, because, under existing conditions, it was well-nigh impossible to fix the responsibility for the Congo government—or misgovernment—as long as it was a personal dependency of the king. If the proposed change takes place, the Congo officials will be directly responsible to the Belgian Parliament, and the government of that country can be dealt with in the usual manner through diplomatic channels, by other governments.

J. M. P., Charlestown, N. H. What effect numerically has immigration had upon our population during the last century?

In addition to the natural growth of a new country, immigration has contributed in large measure. In 1800 the population was six and one-half per square mile. With an area (exclusive of Alaska and the island possessions) nearly three and one-half times as great now as it was in 1800, the population has increased to twenty-eight per square mile. Moreover, the per capita wealth is now four times as great as it was as late as 1850.

S. McB., Lewiston, Ont. Are the automobile and the autotruck driving the horse out of existence? Where are they most useful?

The motor vehicles have as yet made no appreciable difference in the value of the horse. O. P. Austin, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, states that of approximately 100,000,000 horses in the world, 80,000,000 are found in the temperate zone, and the remaining 20,000,000, though scattered throughout the tropics, are employed in the service of temperate zone residents or visitors. The freight motor is being successfully used in tropical and semi-tropical countries, where, when the thermometer above the hundred mark, the horse cannot live.

G. W. J., Plymouth, Mass. I have been reading my own old favorite, Louisa M. Alcott's Little Women, to my young daughter. So true and simple are the delineations of girl life, that we both ask, is the story founded on fact?

Miss Alcott was one of four daughters. The eldest, Anna, was "Meg," of that inimitable classic of girlhood, Little Women. The authoress herself was awkward, tomboy, true-hearted "Jo." Elizabeth, known to the New England girls of two generations as dainty, gentle "Beth," while May, the Alcott baby, like "Amy" in the book, developed much artistic taste and was sent to Paris for study by her writer-sister Louisa, receiving commendation for her work from no less an authority than Ruskin.

A. J. S., Spokane, Wash. Will the Mail-Bag kindly tell me if our government is doing anything for the educational uplift of the Eskimo of Alaska?

The U. S. Bureau of Education is now engaged upon an important movement for the upbuilding of the Alaskan Eskimos. Schools for the Laplanders have been established in various parts of Alaska. The invasion of white men has destroyed the old tribal life, and any project for uplift must embrace a scheme for rendering the Eskimos self-supporting. With the view of creating the vocation of reindeer herder and driver these animals are being introduced from Siberia. Only a few hundred at first, there are now 11,000 reindeer in Alaska. Trustworthy and capable natives foster the herds loaned by the government, and the natural increase is rapid.

M. A. S., Mountain Lake Park, Md. I learn from OUR MAIL-BAG that a model was used by Sculptor Zimm for his lifelike statue at the St. Louis Fair of Sacajawea, the Indian girl who piloted the Lewis and Clark exploraton party? Were Indian women of those days usually extensive travelers, or how did they know the way?

A pupil at the Carlisle Indian School, Pennsylvania, named Virginia Grant, posed for Zimm's statue; she was of the same tribe, the Shoshone, as the woman who she impersonated. The explorers had a French-Canadian interpreter with them whose Indian wife had been sold to him as a slave when a child. As she journeyed with her husband, the memory of scenes long forgotten gradually returned to her, and she was able to lead the party over the path by which she had been brought when captured. It was instinct, like a homing bird, rather than reason, which guided her.

Reader, N.Y., sends us this piece of good hot-weather wisdom:

Somebody gives the following excellent advice: "Drink less, breathe more; eat less, chew more; ride less, walk more; clothe less, bathe more; worry less, work more; waste less, give more; write less, read more; preach less, practise more.

A Great Canadian Missionary Conference

JULY 4 to 12 witnessed the assembling at Whitby, Ont., of a large number of people interested in home and foreign missionary work. The occasion was the Annual International Conference of the Young People's Missionary Movement. A great deal of valuable work was accomplished during the eight days' session. Incidentally, the delegates had a number of pleasant outings and were entertained at receptions, etc. Our photograph shows the entire group of delegates, assembled on the lawn in front of one of the picturesque buildings of Whitby.

PEOPLE TALKED ABOUT

CONSUELO, Duchess of Marlborough, the young American girl who has carried herself so well among the English nobility into which she married, has become one of the foremost philanthropists of London. While not ignoring the social duties of her high station, she is fonder of good works for the poor and unfortunate. The various philanthropies she has started are supported almost entirely from her private purse. She had the intention of visiting her former home in America this summer, but has given up the trip in order to look after her favorite project—a home where the wives of prisoners may obtain work while their bread-winners are in jail. She intends that they shall be taught useful occupations, such as laundering and fine sewing. The duchess has secured a building next to the day nursery which she established for the children of prisoners last year. The women's home she hopes to have ready within two months. When it is complete, both buildings will be dedicated by the Anglican Bishop of London. The duchess leaves no details to the supervision of others. She attends to everything herself, and consequently is one of the most active women in the English metropolis. "I am not seeking public advertisement," said the duchess. "My only object is to bring sunshine into the lives of these unfortunates."

Dr. F. C. Cook

Prof. Harry A. Garfield, of Princeton University, has been called to the presidency of Williams College, at Williamstown, Mass. The announcement of his election was but recently made and attracted much public attention, as the professor is the son of the late President Garfield. Aside from being the son of a distinguished American statesman, the professor has made a name for himself on legal and educational lines. He has been active in political and social reform movements, writing much on these topics. Since 1903 he has been professor in Princeton University. Previously he was in legal practice in Ohio.

Baron Yamamoto

* * *

ADMIRAL BARON YAMAMOTO is visiting in America, studying our methods of ship construction in our navy yards. He was greatly interested in the great shops at the Brooklyn yard, and in the powerful battleship Connecticut, a picture of which was on a recent cover of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The Baron's cordial good will did much to allay the spirit of uneasiness caused by recent statements in the Japanese press. The Baron was Minister of Naval Affairs during the late war with Russia.

IN OUR "Bible and Newspaper" recently there appeared an account of the attempt that is to be made to reach the South Pole. The party will have its sledges drawn by automobile. Dr. F. C. Cook, the well-known scientist and explorer, is about to make a dash for the pole. His party will use automobiles for carrying themselves and their outfits, a great advance over the old method of dog-teams. It is thought that the antarctic ice crust will make a good surface for the machines to travel on.

The Art of Conversation

Some one has said that "conversation is rapidly becoming one of the lost arts." This may be true of those whose daily talk is confined to commonplace things, but the man or woman who possesses a set of 40,000 Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts will never lack for variety of expression or the power to converse charmingly. The set of two volumes (2,000 pages) will be forwarded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to any address on receipt of 60 cents. Express charges to be paid by the purchaser. See announcement on second cover page of this issue.

"White Ribbon" TRADE MARK W.C.T.U. REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
THE NEW Shoe FOR WOMEN OFFICIALLY ENDORSED

EVERY SHOE HELPS

THE WOMEN OF THE W.C.T.U. are already busily at work raising money for the cause by the sale of White Ribbon Shoes. The work is a pleasure, because every pair of shoes bought means several pairs more wanted, and every pair sold means 5 cents for the Union. All you need do is to wear and recommend them.

They are easy, practical, common-sense shoes and they are also good-looking, high-grade shoes. You can have your choice as to style of shoe, price or kind of leather. Light, heavy, high or low, black or brown, kid or colt.

The shoes are all right. Thousands of letters attest the satisfaction of the wearers. Miss Knox, Secretary of Mass. W.C.T.U., writes:

My White Ribbon Shoes received. They are the best feeling and best fitting shoes I ever had. I have worn them continually ever since they came, have been meeting all the trains and arranging entertainment for delegates to World's Convention. I do not know what it is to have a tired foot. I heartily recommend White Ribbon Shoes for every woman. Most cordially,
JANETTE HILL KNOX
Cor. Sec'y and Editor "Our Messenger."

Enclosed you will find draft for $3 28 in payment for my shoes. Please receipt bill and return. My shoes give entire satisfaction and I am pleased with them.
Yours truly, K. A. LEVICK.
June 24, 1907. Headquarters The Willard, Rest Cottage, Evanston, Ill.

I wish to acknowledge the receipt of a pair of your White Ribbon Shoes. They are beauties and fit me perfectly. I have worn _____' shoes entirely for several years, but your White Ribbon shoes surpass them in every respect. They seem to be constructed on the lines of the natural foot and are perfectly comfortable, besides being properly proportioned and finely finished.
Council Bluffs, Ia. Very truly,
June 23, 1907. MRS. J. W. CANE.
A prominent baker.

No. 54
Fine Soft Kid Lace, ¾ vamp, pat. tip, medium low military heel, welt sole; pure oak belting sole.

Very flexible, stitched belting top piece on heel, antiseptic covered soft cushion inner-sole. White Ribbon process. Price $4

Made over last especially designed and graded for the White Ribbon line.

The flexible, cushion sole of this shoe, which is only one of many different styles, makes it particularly attractive to people who have tender feet and are compelled to walk or stand a great deal.

THE PLAN IS SIMPLE

Every one of these good-looking, comfortable shoes contains a coupon as shown below, good for 5 cents. When the shoes are sold, the dealer removes the coupon and holds it until someone appointed by the local or State Union calls for it. These coupons are sent to the State President, who stamps them and forwards them to the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Lincoln, Neb., who send the money to the proper officials.

Your dealer will gladly carry them in stock if you create a demand.

If your dealer does not carry the shoes, write to the manufacturers and they will send you complete instructions for the opening of a local agency in your community. Remember, it will be a pleasure to wear these shoes yourself and recommend them to your friends, and at the same time every pair contributes 5 Cents to the W.C.T.U. Write for full particulars to

"Ha! then you have a lover!" His eyes blazed with fury. He laid his hand on the hilt of his sword. "Where is he, that I may sweep him from my path?"

Gabrielle laughed scornfully.

"You need not threaten him," said she, calmly. "You cannot touch him; he is beyond your reach."

"He shall not be beyond my reach, if he is to be found in this land of France!" said he fiercely. "Where is he?"

"In the galleys."

Girard started in amazement.

"In the galleys?" he repeated; "and for what crime?"

"Crime, do you say? For an act so noble, that I suppose you, and such as you, are not able to appreciate it, or even comprehend it. His old father, one of the proscribed preachers, being in danger of that fearful punishment, he personated his father, and let himself be taken to the galleys in his stead."

"You are wrong, Mademoiselle," said Girard, whose passionate outburst had suddenly calmed. "You are mistaken in your estimate of me. I can appreciate an act like that, even if done by a Huguenot. He is a brave and chivalrous man. But why cling to him now? You will never see him again. You will never even hear from him, for galley slaves are not permitted to communicate with their friends. He is lost to you, as you truly said. You can never marry him. Then why not accept me, Francis Girard, captain in his Majesty's Dragoons, and prospective peer of France? For my mother is Countess of Belvoisin in her own right, and I am heir to her title and estates."

But Gabrielle shook her head; though surprised by the sudden and tempting offer, she was unmoved by it.

"It cannot be, Captain Girard; the love I bear to Louis Marquand is so intertwined with every fibre of my heart, that it can only cease when that heart ceases to beat. For life or death, for weal or wo, I am his."

He gazed on her with a passionate longing in his eyes.

"Oh that I could be loved with such steadfastness! Your very devotion to my rival makes me love you the more!"

"But have you considered the matter? Have you thought of what might be the consequences of your union with a Huguenot girl? Your wife might be torn from your arms by your own soldiers and imprisoned in a convent, her life made miserable, her hair shaved off—"

"Never!" exclaimed he, "while I can wield this sword!" laying his hand on it again with a look of determination.

"Then there is your mother to think of," continued Gabrielle. "How would she, a Catholic and a court lady, receive a daughter-in-law who is only a merchant's daughter, and is a member of the hated and proscribed new religion?"

"My mother is a Catholic, it is true, but she is good—she loves me dearly. She desires my happiness. You would soon win her, Gabrielle, as you have won her son."

They walked on for some moments in silence. Then drawing nearer to her, and unconsciously lowering his voice, as if afraid of being overheard by the listening trees and bushes, "Gabrielle," said he, "would you marry me if I should—should forswear the religion in which I was brought up, and become, like yourself, a Huguenot?"

"For shame! Captain Girard," exclaimed Gabrielle, "would you mock God with a false profession of faith, merely to gratify a mad, wild passion for a woman who can give you no love in return?"

"Nay, it need not be a false profession. I have never thought much about religion, to say the truth; yet I cannot but believe that a religion which produces such as you must have some good in it."

Again he walked on silently, then said abruptly: "Your father is planning to escape from La Rochelle. He thinks it is not known, but it is. I have watched his every movement, and shall do nothing to hinder him. He shall go when he is ready, to England, to America, or where he will. He shall go, and all his family shall go with him—save one. She shall remain in France, and after a time, when the edge of her sorrow is worn off, she will marry Francis Girard, and dwell in the Château of Belvoisin, its châtelaine, its mistress, beloved of all her people, the idol of her husband."

"I am afraid, Captain Girard, it is a Château en Espagne that you are building. I shall go with my father, of course."

To this he made no reply.

They had now reached the edge of the wood, where he had left his horse, which was trying to crop the green herbage, in spite of its bit.

"I must leave you now," said he, with a deep sigh. "I shall see you again before you go."

Remounting his horse, he raised his hat and rode away.

CHAPTER IX

The Three Windmills

SEVERAL months had elapsed since the inroad of the dragoons on La Rochelle, when one day Captain Girard made his appearance at David de Bonnefoy's house, and ordered the twenty soldiers billeted there to remove to other quarters.

As their "mission" had proved so totally abortive, the soldiers would have liked still further to injure the house and annoy the inmates, but this the Captain peremptorily forbade. Nay, more; he apologized, to David's surprise, for the evil they had already wrought. "They are rough fellows," he said. "They know no laws but those of plunder and pillage."

The way being now clear, David proceeded to carry out his plan of emigrating.

The first to be taken on board the English ship (which was rather inappropriately named the Lively Polly) was old Pastor Marquand, who had been all this while successfully concealed in the attic of his former home. He was packed in a great, loose bundle of hay, which two stout porters carried on board and deposited in the hold. But this arrangement had nearly proved fatal to the pastor. For a soldier, prowling around in the hold in search of "contraband" freight, thrust his sword into the bundle of hay, and pierced the flesh of the old man—who had the fortitude, however, to suppress a cry, and even to wipe the blood from the point of the sword lest it should betray him. The wound, fortunately, was slight.

The next passenger to be smuggled on board was old Christine, the faithful servant and general factotum of the family, who refused to be left behind. She was gotten up in the disguise of a washerwoman, with a huge "creel" of clothes on her back, and a bundle under each arm, ostensibly the clean linen of the ship's company, but in fact the personal effects of the family.

August Joys at Mont-Lawn

NETY-FIVE little tenement boys and girls from the big city, brown hearty as a result of their ten days' ry outing at Mont-Lawn, rattled down illside in the big stages, and embarked upon the ferry-boat which lay at the Nyack wharf. At the same time, a well-appointed touring car was driven up the gangway. Its occupants were equipped with all the motoring paraphernalia which modern luxury commands, its owner being apparently a man of wealth and fashion. Noting the band of youthful travelers, perhaps a

Three years o the little maid organized her playmates o an enthusiastic auxiliary of the big C. T. U., and immediately began to tribute to our beautiful summer charity. is year the plucky children have gath- ed together the entire sum of $21 neces- y to endow a cot for the season. Is it ssible to conceive of any truer temper- ce work to which these loyal young lives uld devote themselves, than that of giv- g to a long succession of forlorn tene- nt waifs a bright, glorious peep into a rld where Christ is king, where love gns and where the Golden Rule is the ly printed rule of conduct for superin- ndent, teacher and child? We welcome e Minnesota L. T. L. to our ranks and st that the example may prove a stimu- s to many another energetic Gladys and r friends, whose feet are set thus early on the upward path of service.

Clothing for the poorest of the Mont- wn waifs comes in well, in response to peals; but there are among the gifts no tle half-worn shoes. Gifts of serviceable oes will be very acceptable.

Three dollars will send a child to Mont- wn. So many inquiries have come to from various quarters as to the sum of oney required for a perpetual cot endow- ent, that we are moved to print the an- ver, contrary to the usual custom. $500 needed to yield sufficient interest to per- anently support one cot.

Two ladies from Grand Forks, N. D., ow sojourning in the East, write:

Y. W. C. A. Home. 15 E. 16th St.,
New York, July 15.

Dear Dr. Klopsch: Through your courtesy we ere enabled to visit Mont-Lawn to-day and we wish to thank you. We saw the children as they marched to their evening meal and partook of the wholesome food. I assure you we relished the sight as much as they the food. Then we were privileged to worship with them in that little gem of architecture, the "Children's Temple," and enjoyed especially hearing them sing the Bible verses set to music. We got a glimpse of the little white beds in one of the dormitories, and reluctantly returned to the station.

It must be a great privilege to do a work so full of possibilities. Again we thank you.

(Misses) M. J. Aldrich and Beatrice Johnstone.

Rev. Dr. Sanford's Visit

I am sitting at the sunset hour in the high stone tower at Mont Lawn. It is Saturday eve, and the children are in ecstasies of delight at the close of the afternoon play-hour, in which they have been delighted with the sunshine scattered by Dr. Klopsch's visit to the Children's Paradise. I am reminded that the children have had supper and will soon go to bed, after a short service in the chapel, for they awake with the lark each morning, and "early to bed" is the ideal for Mont-Lawn. I will give them to-night an illustrated lecture on the "Flags of the Nations," and will use flags of Italy, Germany, England, Japan, Turkey, Spain, Greece, France, and even Old Ireland. These will bring before the children object lessons of the peoples of this great world. I will use also an American flag, like "Old Glory," which is floating above me on the tower flag-staff, in full view of the Hudson River boats, to help the children of many nationalities represented in the home to realize what a beautiful work of amalgamation our country is doing for the human race, and how generously The Christian Herald Children's Home welcomes all, and cultivates broad patriotic sentiments. Narrowness is discouraged by the one who loves God and little children. I am sure that your large circle of friends and philanthropic subscribers can do no better sunshine work than to send money enough to gladden the hearts of one or more children of the city for a time in the country. I expect to give several stereopticon lectures during the summer, and pray that this noble work (the best of its kind I have ever known) may prosper. I enclose a small check to help some child to see nature at Mont-Lawn.

Sincerely,
Ezra T. Sanford.

Prayer-Meeting Topics

By J. C. H.

WHAT is the meaning for each of us of the Scripture, "He that offendeth in one point is guilty of all," emphasized by Christ's declaration that if we have done all things commanded we have done only that which it was our duty to do?

If laymen study the Bible and learn the divine will, have they the obligation to teach publicly?

If we adopted Paul's principle of knowing nothing among men but Christ, and him crucified, what would our life be?

Do the churches of to-day exemplify what God requires and expects in their life and work?

Is each of us ready to repeat to Christ the question of the rich young man who inquired, "What lack I yet?" or of Paul, "What wilt thou have me to do?" Can we testify to the world from our own experience that it is well with the righteous and that no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly?

Is purity of heart and doing all to the glory of God possible unless we believe in and expect it?

How could Paul rejoice with "joy unspeakable and full of glory," while God's name was so dishonored, and there was so much wickedness around him?

What is the life taught by Paul in Heb. 12: 4: "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, striving against sin"?

A Life of Christian Service

MANY readers of this journal will regret to learn of the death of Mr. George MacLachlan, which occurred at his late residence, 100 Sherman Place, Jersey City Heights, on Thursday, July 18. Born near Glasgow, Scotland, sixty-seven years ago, he associated himself in his early manhood with the Assembly of Brethren and remained a member of that community till the day of his death. He came to America with his family twenty-four years ago, settled in Jersey City Heights, and was an active member of the Gospel Hall on Summit Avenue there for many years. The simple funeral service was held there on Sunday afternoon, the 21st of July, and was very largely attended. Many testified to the great love and respect in which the deceased was held by his associates. He leaves a widow and seven of a family. Interment was made at Brookside Cemetery, Englewood, N. J. An earnest, sincere and sympathetic Christian, Mr. MacLachlan spent his life in the Master's service. His unostentatious, simple faith, his helpful hand and his wise counsel were ever at the service of those in need. He taught the love of Christ not only by his words, but by his deeds. His death was the going home of a Christian and was the fitting close to a beautiful life.

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market about ten weeks ago it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom have given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. The megaphone principle and the flat-sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is "Unseen Comfort." The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored. Let me write you about it. I will give you facts only and will not exaggerate.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Care of the Child*

SPECIAL provision is made in the divine programme for the children. Their training is to begin early. They are to be taught what God has done for their parents. How good and true and faithful he has been, and they are to be encouraged to make him their God, and to serve him with all their hearts. Our own experience endorses this injunction. If the whole church were polled, it would be found that more than one-half became Christians before reaching the age of twenty years. It is hard to win the man who has entered the business world. He is so occupied with money-making or with his professional duties that he has seldom time or inclination to think of spiritual concerns. Still harder is it to win him in his declining years. His habits are formed, his ways are set, he cannot easily divorce himself from his modes of thought, his inclinations and customs. Few old or even middle-aged men can be induced to turn from sin and seek God. But if the heart can be preempted in childhood; if the boy or girl can be led to see the beauty and joy of a Christian life before the world usurps the throne, then there is hope of their living for God.

What a changed world this would be, half a century hence, if every Christian would earnestly try to lead his own children into the kingdom in their youth! If he would undertake the task himself and the mother herself, not leaving the duty to the minister or Sunday School teacher, but by example and by judicious teaching and by earnest prayer, striving to bring their children into Christ's care, how many might be won! We do not advocate the teaching of religion with such persistence that the child is nauseated. There is reason to fear that some conceive a disgust for it, by being compelled to attend services and prayer-meetings, for which they must sacrifice the play-hour—a disgust that unhappily continues through life. But, with tact and discretion, with cheerfulness and kindness, try to gain the child's heart. It is worth doing. Those wild oats that otherwise he is so liable to sow grow with frightful rapidity and are hard to root up. It is a struggle for supremacy in that childish soul that has to be fought between the powers of good and of evil, and he that is first in the field is most likely to win.

Decision of Character*

IN politics, in business, and in social life, as well as in religion, the undecided man, the waverer, is a trial to himself and to all with whom he comes into relation. As a popular writer characterizes him, he is "a man who runs easily into any mould, but does not keep shape." Hesitating, taking first one course, then another, he is like the nervous driver of a spirited horse in a crowded thoroughfare; foredoomed to disaster. Elijah's appeal to his people might well be addressed to such a man: "How long halt ye between two opinions?" Be one thing or the other. Do not try the vacillating policy of supporting religion on Sunday and following Mammon all the remainder of the week. It gets a man into embarrassment and difficulty, and leaves him at the end without reward.

The undecided man in politics is a nuisance to all parties. There is no counting on him. He is swayed this way and that, gives no enthusiastic support to either party and up to the polling day is uncertain for whom he will vote. This, too, not because the political parties have abandoned their principles, but because the man, having no settled principles of his own, cannot make up what he calls his mind. In business, such a man is of little value. He is continually hesitating as to his policy, uncertain how to act at a turn of the market, undecided whether to buy or sell, until the time for action is past. In social life, such a man is a doubtful friend, unreliable and changeable. He has not the courage to stand up and oppose a calumny, is not sure that it is not deserved, is uncertain whether a wrongdoer should be forgiven and restored, or cast out.

Most disastrous of all is the undecided man's course in religion. There is something very contemptuous about the mention of Laodicea in the Apocalypse. I would thou wert cold or hot, but because thou art neither, but only lukewarm, I will cast thee out of my mouth. The undecided man tries every one's patience that has to do with him. A little temptation overcomes him, a little opposition makes him desert his colors, a specious error draws him aside. He is, as James says, like a wave of the sea, driven and tossed and unstable in all his ways. Yet a man easily drifts into indecision, which is more a habit than a disposition, and therefore should be watched against with constant vigilance.

Make Your Letters Interesting

Has it never happened, while writing a letter to some friend whom you greatly respect for his culture, that you would encounter an awkward expression in your letter which you greatly wished to improve? In Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, you can have an almost limitless field of the most varied sort from which you may enrich and beautify your correspondence. The two volumes (aggregating 2,000 pages) are for sale by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at a nominal price of sixty cents. Express charges to be paid by the purchaser. See announcement on second cover page of this issue.

Called Higher

On March 23, Mr. H. C. Crownover, of Saulsbug, Pa., passed to the life everlasting. Mr. Crownover was in his sixty sixth year, dying in the faith of Christ.

William B. Porter, of Lucasville, O., fell asleep in Jesus on March 13. Mr. Porter was born in Philadelphia in 1834, and has led a consistent Christian life. He leaves a widow, four sons and two daughters.

Mary E., wife of Thomas G. Orwig, of Des Moines, Iowa, departed this life on March 15. Mrs. Orwig was a woman whose name was a synonym for a noble character evidenced by noble deeds. Thirty-nine years ago, after an active life of service with her husband during the Civil War, they became residents of Des Moines, where they were soon prominently identified with philanthropic and church work. Sitting for twenty years in darkness she was always hopeful and buoyant, saying at the last, "Now I am ready for my heavenly home."

Fort Worth, Texas, lost one of its most honored citizens when Dr. A. P. Brown passed to his reward at the age of seventy-five years. For thirty-five years Dr. Brown had been an earnest, faithful Christian, and in the practice of medicine he was able to point many to the "Way of Life." The multitude who have benefited by his kindness and charity will miss him sorely, and to the dear ones in his own family the bereavement is hard to bear. He had, however, been a sufferer for several years, and even those who loved him best can rejoice that he is at peace.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST FRANK A. MILLER, now of Lincoln, Neb., has just closed a very successful union tent meeting at Wymore, Neb.

—AGNES PAYNTER and Nellie M. Bryant, missionaries in Ceylon, write: "One of the objects worshiped on Komati Lanka Island was a huge, high post, with a few bunches of corn tied at the top."

—THE CONVENTION of the Presbyterian Brotherhood of America will be held in Cincinnati, November 12 to 14. There will be an exchange of practical information about the work successful organizations are doing.

—MANORAMABAI, the accomplished daughter of the famous Pundita Ramabai, founder of the Mukti Mission at Poona, India, is now actively engaged in spiritual work in the same field. She writes us thanking the friends who have contributed to the mission.

—THE MUNCIE ISLAND Annual Bible Conference takes place September 1 to 8. Evangelists John A. Davis and E. F. Hallenbeck will be in charge, and the Revs. J. Wilbur Chapman, R. A. Torrey and many other distinguished preachers are expected to participate.

—REV. FRANK DEWITT TALMAGE preached the funeral sermon on the victims of the steamship Columbia disaster, whose bodies were brought to San Francisco by the steamship Elder. There was a very large audience, and many were deeply affected by the eloquent memorial service.

SOAKED IN COFFEE

Until too Stiff to Bend Over.

"When I drank coffee I often had s[ick] headaches, nervousness and biliousness m[uch] of the time but when I went to visit a frie[nd] got in the habit of drinking Postum.

"I gave up coffee entirely and the result h[as] been that I have been entirely relieved of [all] my stomach and nervous trouble.

"My mother was just the same way. [We] all drink Postum now and, without coffee [in] the house for 2 years, we are all well.

"A neighbor of mine, a great coffee drink[er] was troubled with pains in her side for ye[ars] and was an invalid. She was not able to [do] her work and could not even mend clothes [or] do anything at all where she would have [to] bend forward. If she tried to do a little h[ard] work she would get such pains that she wo[uld] have to lie down for the rest of the day.

"At last I persuaded her to stop drinking coffee and try Postum Food Coffee and [she] did so and has used Postum ever since; [the] result has been that she can now do her wo[rk], can sit for a whole day and mend and can s[it] on the machine and she never feels the le[ast] bit of pain in her side in fact she has got w[ell] and it shows coffee was the cause of the wh[ole] trouble.

"I could also tell you about several of [my] neighbors who have been relieved by quitting coffee and using Postum in its place." "There's a reason." Look in pkg. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Four-Score Beautiful Years

AMONG the many "vacant chairs" which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family has had reason to regret during the years of its united existence, seldom is it called upon to mourn a greater loss from its circle than that which occurred on June 27, in the passing on of Mrs. Louisa Specht, of Prairie du Chien, Wis.

The Late Mrs. Louisa Specht

Mrs. Specht, born in Germany in 1826, with her husband sought citizenship in the United States in 1847. It is to such immigrants as they proved to be, in industry, integrity and loyalty to their adopted country, that America in large measure owes her present high place among the nations of the earth.

During the Civil War, Mr. Specht fought and died for the Union cause, leaving his widow with slender resources and a large family to rear to manhood and womanhood. A devoted Christian from her youth, in this testing time of her faith and courage, the mother proved the promises upon which she leaned, bringing her seven children to a maturity enriched by the memory of a home where Christ was truly the "Head of the house, an unseen Guest at the table."

Never losing interest in the busy world about her, though confined to her room by paralysis for several years before her death, the changing seasons and family festivities were a "well-spring of joy" to the aged invalid. Of her devotion to and spiritual growth through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, her pastor writes: "She always knew the exact hour when her CHRISTIAN HERALD was due each week, and that was her best day. She carefully read every article, and though so deaf that she was unable to hear Christian testimony from those about her, a daughter testifies that she grew in saintliness of character by the constant reading of your paper."

Followed to her grave by numerous children and grandchildren unto the third and fourth generation, a noble woman of more than four score beautiful years has laid the sheaves of a well-spent lifetime at the feet of the Master whom she served.

Types of the Atonement

By Mrs. M. BAXTER

IN order to do his priest's office, there must be no sin or uncleanness on Aaron or on his house; every member must be pure before God, else Aaron could not be in a position to make an atonement for the people. As the author of the golden calf, Aaron could not, surely, forget what a sinful heart he had. But Jesus, our great High Priest, needed no offering; he was already "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners" (Heb. 7: 26).

Aaron must put on the holy garments, for he stood clothed in Another's righteousness—himself was hidden. Christ, when he made atonement, was unclothed—his flesh was holy; he had passed through all temptations which are common to man, had "suffered being tempted," and remained "holy, harmless, undefiled, separate."

Before the atonement could be made for the people, everything must be cleansed—Aaron, his household, and the tabernacle itself. The altar also must be sprinkled with the blood of the high priest's offering and the people's offering, for the very holy place itself could not be clean so long as the priests and the people were not cleansed. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins; and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth amongst them in the midst of their uncleanness."

Aaron must be alone in that solemn moment. "There shall be no man in the tabernacle": Aaron undertaking, under cover of that blood, to represent and atone for himself, his household, and the whole congregation of Israel. Again, before Aaron could be accepted, he must bring incense kindled with God's fire from off the altar, which should cover the mercy seat with its cloud of smoke "that he die not." Even the altar of burnt-offering—the remembrance of the priest's and the people's sin—must be cleansed, and the life-blood poured out, for it must be put upon the horns of the altar. "And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel."

The altar and the tabernacle were both types of Christ, and yet both imperfect, both defiled by uncleanness. Christ alone, as the Sin-offering, could identify himself with our sin, could come in contact with sin, and yet know no sin, remain "without sin" (II. Cor. 5: 21; Heb. 4: 15). He alone could be made sin for us, even be "made a curse for us," and yet be "undefiled" (Gal. 3: 13; Heb. 7: 26). But the horrible anguish of those hours in Gethsemane, and on the cross, can only be imagined by considering the exact opposite. If the freedom, liberty and sense of relief which I experience in the conscious pardon of my sins be so great, what, then, must have been the oppression, the inconceivable weight of anguish, which lay upon him, when his pure being which knew no sin came in contact with all possible defilement!

"And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat; and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness; and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness."

I am now more than ever convinced that in offering the Basket Washer at $3.50 I am making wash-day one of the easiest days of the week for thousands of women, whereas it was the hardest and most dreaded.

There was never any doubt in my mind but that the Washer would do its work, but I had to expect each day a mail to bring me both one to a dozen of the enthusiastic letters I have received, and I am sure that I have not yet received the last one.

It matters little in what part of the country a user lives, I have yet to receive a letter condemning the Washer from some one near you, or even somewhere in town.

The Basket Washer will positively wash a tub of clothes in six minutes. Some purchasers say they can even beat that record—but that time is short enough.

Detroit City, Mich., April 29, 1907.

DEAR SIR: Received your Basket Washer some time ago, and have been very sick for over a month. In fact I am still under the doctor's care. Would say we didn't think very much of it at first, but as the proof of the pudding is in the eating, I found out differently. We can't say enough for it now. Garments that were almost ruined came out clean and white without any extra labor. Thank you very much.

MRS. IDA SPEECE.

DAYTON, O., May 9, 1907.

DEAR SIR: I received the Washer all right, and we tried it this morning and think it fine and so easy and simple to use. I shall recommend it to my friends, and thank you very much for sending such a lovely little Washer. Yours, MRS. MARY L. ANDREWS, 42 West 6th St.

On account of the general advance in prices of materials, freight rates, effective August 1, 1907, I am forced to withdraw prepaying freight. The price of the Washer remains $3.50.

I can't send the Washer on trial, the low price prohibiting, but I'll return your money absolutely if you're not satisfied.

This is the Basket Washing Machine I have told you so much about, which I am selling at $3.50, F. O. B. Fremont.

Questions and Answers

Jennie W., Lawrence, Ala. How long was Noah in building the ark? Does it give the correct time in the Bible?

The only passage which can be construed as possibly referring to the subject is found in Gen. 6:3. Commentators differ, however, some holding that it refers to the longevity of man and others to the period of grace or warning before the flood.

Miss A. B., Manifest, La. 1. Is Prof. Lewis Swift, astronomer, a descendant of General Swift of the Revolutionary War, and of the war of 1812 and 1815? 2. What time elapsed from Moses' return to Egypt until his departure with the hosts of Israel for Canaan?

1. He is the son of Gen. Lewis Swift and Anna Forbes Swift, and was born in 1820. 2. Commentators fix the date of his return to Egypt from his exile at B.C. 1658, and the date of the exodus forty years later, or B.C. 1618. Usher's chronological tables (usually found in the margin of the Bible) differ from this, however, and give B.C. 1491 as the approximate date of the plagues and the exodus.

R. B. P., Redbarn, Ark. If Christ had a new body at his resurrection, how was it that it was so easily recognized?

No one contends that he had a new body. The marks of the nails showed that it was the same. The empty sepulchre proved that the body had been raised. But changes had been made in it. John says he entered a room while the doors were shut (John 20:36). He appeared in Jerusalem and shortly afterwards far away in Galilee. You must have read the Gospels very carelessly if you believe that his resurrection body was easily recognized. Mary Magdalene mistook him for the gardener (John 20:15). The two disciples were in his company for an hour or more without recognizing him (Luke 24:13), which was so extraordinary that Luke supposes their eyes must have been "held." The disciples in the boat "knew not that it was Jesus" (John 21:5), and Matthew admits that after all "some doubted" (Matt. 28:17). As Paul said, speaking of the body in the grave: "Thou sowest not that body that shall be, but God giveth it a body" (I. Cor. 15:37, 38). In matters of which we are necessarily ignorant, because so little is revealed, it does not become us to be dogmatic, or wise above that which is written.

M. H. S., Chicago, Ill. Please tell me if Ida Lewis, the life-saver, is alive yet. If so, where does she live?

Ida Lewis is yet alive, and, at sixty-six years of age, still lives at the Lime Rock Lighthouse in Newport Harbor, occupying the same room she has occupied for fifty years. She has been visited there by Grant, Colfax, Sherman, Dewey, Susan B. Anthony and many other celebrities who were anxious to pay their respects to the woman who, up to date, has saved the lives of eighteen persons.

J. B. C., Tiverton, Ont. 1. Did Jesus rise before the stone was rolled away? 2. What was the comparison which Christ put to Peter (John 21:15)? 3. Should children be reproved for misbehavior in church?

1. As the stone was already rolled away when the women reached the sepulchre, there is nothing to show whether the resurrection preceded its removal or not. 2. Peter had been a boaster. Though all men might forsake Jesus, yet would not he. Jesus' words were a gentle reproof. Did he still claim to love him more than did the other disciples? Peter had become humble by that time and merely declared his love without comparing himself with others. 3. Allowance is to be made for children who have to sit through a service they cannot appreciate, but they should not be allowed to disturb the congregation. Their parents should take care they do not do that.

Subscriber, McNair, Miss. Does not Ex. 14:7 prove conclusively that Pharaoh was drowned in the Red Sea?

No; it simply states that Pharaoh gathered a hurried force and pursued the Israelites. We still speak of a commander of an army doing this or that, when we know that he simply ordered it—as Grant or Lee planted his guns on such a hill, etc. The probability is that Pharaoh marched with his army to the seashore and sent his chariots forward, remaining behind himself. He was the kind of man who took no unnecessary risks. The Israelites, seeing the dead Egyptians on the shore in the morning, were not likely to go back to ascertain if Pharaoh himself was among the slain. Nor would they receive in the desert any newspapers telling whether he had escaped or not. They naturally concluded he was drowned, and so sang of his death in their hymn of triumph.

Emily G., Dayton, O. We are greatly interested in the "missionary substitute" plan, and our church and Sunday School are arranging to have one or more substitutes. Kindly let me know the rates of support in Africa, Korea, India and China.

We give below the latest applications from the countries named:

1 native Christian teacher, Satara Dist., India, $5 per month.
1 native Christian physician, Ahmednagar Dist., India, $5 per month.
6 native Christian teachers, Gerroway, Africa, $40 per year.
2 native evangelists, Meerut, India, $50 per year.
45 native pastors, Inhambane, Africa, $60 per year.
2 native Bible women, Pyeng Yang, Korea, $42 per year.
3 native Bible women, Wuhu, China, $36 per year.
5 native teachers, Wuhu, China, $50 per year.
4 native evangelists, Wuhu, China, $60 per year.
6 native teachers (women), Borneo, $45 per year.

The denominations represented are Congregational, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist and Advent. An inquiry from any of our readers interested in the plan to have a personal missionary substitute at the front, will receive immediate attention.

P. M. R., Akron, O. To what family does the present German ruler belong and how old is it?

As a royal house, the Hohenzollern stock, to which the present Emperor William belongs, dates from 1701. As an imperial house, it dates only from 1871. Compared with many royal houses, such as the Austrian Hapsburgs, it is very modern; yet it is doubtful if any line has, in so short a time, produced so many able rulers.

F. M. B., Perry, Mich. Can you explain the references to Melchizedek in Heb. 7:1-11?

Melchizedek was the priest-king of Jerusalem in the days of Abraham. You will find the account of Abraham's relations to him in Gen. 14. The writer of the Hebrews was endeavoring to show the Jews that there were types of the New Testament truths in the Old Testament, and he adduces this to show that there was a higher or earlier priesthood than that of Levi. Thus Abraham, the ancestor of Levi, paid tithes to Melchizedek, and in so doing acknowledged his priestly rank. It is merely an illustration of his argument. There is no special mystery about Melchizedek. Being without father or mother simply meant that he had risen from the people, his father and mother having no royal standing, and there is no record of his descendants as there is of others. It is a curious fact that among the writings recently discovered at Tel-el-Amarna there is a letter from a governor who uses the same words. He says that he is not like other governors, inasmuch as he did not inherit his crown from his father and mother, but it was conferred upon him by the mighty king.

B. M., Montpelier, Vt. Did the United States originate the "Permanent Arbitration Tribunal" idea at The Hague, or if not, to what nation does the credit belong?

The idea of a Peace Court of the Nations is more than a century old. It has been revived several times in the last half century, but not until the idea found a powerful advocate in the Czar, was there a prospect of it coming to pass. The United States is the first of the assembled Powers to introduce the subject in parliamentary form. Mr. Choate explained the American scheme to be for an International Court, open at all times to all nations, seventeen judges, nine to form a quorum, big and little Powers to have equal representation; no Power to sit as judge on its own case; fixed annual meetings; court decisions to be made by an absolute majority; court to appoint commissions to try cases where necessary, and the court itself to deal with any appeals that may be made; no member of court to be a member of a commission. Germany, Great Britain and Russia favor the American project.

V. J. R., Rome, N. Y. Who discovered the metal known as radium?

Professor Pierre Curie, a member of the Sorbonne faculty, in Paris, had a student in his laboratory whom he married. Together they worked and studied, and the discovery of the elusive metal which has wrought such a revolution in the scientific world, was a joint work. Professor Curie was killed a year ago, and his widow was appointed to fill his chair. She is the first woman who ever lectured at the Sorbonne, and her course on electricity has crowded the auditorium with the scholars of France.

R. F., Fernandina, Fla. I have lately met with the statement in several publications that the Anglo-Saxon race is physically deteriorating. Is there any substantial foundation for such a conclusion?

Not in the United States, at all events, where the tendency to all sorts of athletics and out-door sports is steadily gaining ground. Some time ago, a sensational statement of the kind was current in England. It was said that men were losing and women gaining in strength and development, and that an unusual proportion of applicants for military enlistment had been rejected as falling below the physical standard.

S. W. H., Acushnet, Mass. Was not General Botha, the Premier of the Transvaal under English control, a Boer at the time of the war?

He was. Louis Botha six years ago was heading an armed force on the Boer veldt against England. When the war was over he was elected to the first Congress of the Transvaal, and now at forty-four years of age, under King Edward VII., the Right Honorable General Botha holds a rank equal to that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the Premier of the present Canadian ministry.

Workers on the World's Biggest Pepper Plantation, on Avery Island, La.

THE biggest pepper plantation in the world is on Avery Island, La. It is an island of sea-marsh, which stretches along the Louisiana coast. There are 450 acres planted in peppers. When the fruit ripens at about mid-August, there is no prettier sight imaginable than these blood-red acres. The owner of the island found himself land-poor after the Civil War. Some one gave him some peppers, the seeds of which he planted. When his little crop matured, he experimented with the fruit in a sauce which proved successful commercially. Every year he planted more acres in peppers, until to-day Louisiana claims the world's biggest pepper plantation. At maturity the pepper plant is about four feet in height. The flower is of a delicate white color, and has a drooping appearance. The fruit is cylindrical and slender. There is a hamlet near the pepper fields where many of the workers live. The labor is composed principally of Acadians and negroes. Mid-August finds the peppers usually ready for gathering. Then is the animated season on the plantation. Clusters of pepper-pickers may be seen here and there over the fields, with boxes tied about their waists, into which they gather the fruit. Some of the pickers are children. Clever pepper-pickers can earn $2 a day. White pepper is not as much to be valued as black, as it is the seed without the outer parts of the fruit, which are considered nourishing. HELEN GRAY.

Grace L., Red Wing, Minn. "To-morrow will be" and "yesterday was" are obviously correct.

Welaka, Fla. Write to Deaconess Training Home and School, Madison Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street, New York City, for information concerning definite work for Methodist women.

W. C. T., Durango, Col. We have been unable to secure the information. If you send your question to the director of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D.C., he will answer your query without charge.

M. E. G., Fairbury, Neb. The person mentioned in the first part of your letter, who lives in San Francisco, is said to be a Hebrew. We believe that the other, who has only recently come under religious influence, is not a member of any church.

E. A. O., Centerville, Ark. The nations usually considered non-Christian are Turkey, Persia, Japan, China; the people of India, Siam, Burmah, Tibet; the various nations and tribes in Africa, many parts of Asia; various tribes in parts of Central and South America, Mexico and the islands of the Pacific. It would take far too much space to attempt to give a complete list by name, but the above shows their location in a general way. Of course it must be remembered that in most of the above countries missionaries have made many converts to Christianity. Send your second question to Colonel Holland of the Salvation Army Headquarters, New York City.

The Picturesque Madeira "Cab"

LIFE IN THE BALMY MADEIRAS

ABOUT fifteen hundred miles south of England and five hundred miles southwest of Lisbon, in the North Atlantic Ocean, lie the beautiful, salubrious d fertile Madeira Islands, called "the pearl in the own of Portugal." They were discovered by Portuese mariners in 1419, and soon thereafter colonized by ose thrifty people. When the colonists were well ttled, building homes and becoming successful in busiss, a fire broke out on the islands and burned steadily r seven years, threatening complete destruction of all wn and village improvements. But the vigorous and daunted population triumphed er hindrance and loss, and toy there are many evidences of eir wisdom and enterprise even those trying times.

Funchal, the capital, with a pulation of more than forty ousand, is admirably located, ke a vast amphitheatre fronting e ocean, and is a place of eculiar interest and charm to avelers. Fifteen hundred ships an find anchorage in the beauful bay, including naval fleets, aining ships, excursion steamrs and merchant ships from all arts of the world.

For more than four hundred ears Roman Catholicism, suported by the civil government, ad absolute control in these slands, and therefore was not ikely to be friendly to any form f Protestantism. However, Providence interposed, for in 838 Robert Reid Kalley, a ative Scotch physician of Edinburgh, was ordained a missionary by the Free Church of Scotland and appointed to a mission in China. Soon after entering on he voyage, Dr. Kalley's wife was taken so seriously ill that it was necessary for them to go ashore at the nearest available port, which was Funchal, where she was taken to the hospital.

As soon as possible, Dr. Kalley commenced evangelistic services with encouraging results. No serious or violent opposition to these efforts were manifest until the converts numbered some twelve to sixteen hundred members. Then persecution commenced, bitter, cruel and long continued, with a purpose on a given date to kill all Protestants, including the missionary. Until recent years, decent burial was refused the Protestants; the bodies of their dead were thrown either into the sea or buried in a hole at some crossroads, and other forms of persecution were also patiently endured. But the good seed of the Kingdom lived in the hearts of a few, and when in 1898 American Methodism commenced its missionary work, it was soon triumphant in the conversion of nearly fifty men and women near the very place where Dr. Kalley's work was strongest.

Renewed interest is manifest in the evangelization of the Madeira Islands through the recent visits of Bishops Joseph C. Hartzell and William Burt of the Methodist Episcopal Church, whose preaching, counsel and encouragement has strengthened the cause and cheered the missionaries. The work of the Methodists is mostly among the Portuguese. The headquarters of the missions is at Funchal, where a large and valuable property is rented and occupied. It is the expectation of Bishop Hartzell that in the near future this property will be purchased and so transformed as to be serviceable for publishing interests, religious services, training school and a rest home for missionaries pertaining to the Madeira Islands, the Azores, the Cape Verde Islands and the Portuguese possessions in West and East Africa.

The three centres of mission work are at Funchal, San Antonio de Serra and Machico, the latter being ten and fourteen miles from Funchal respectively. At San Antonio de Serra is located Mount Faith Mission House, 2,150 feet above sea level, where the missionaries have had remarkable success. At Machico, during December, 1906, Bishops Hartzell and Burt dedicated, free of debt, a beautiful little chapel costing about $2,000. At the last-named mission, the Rev. George B. Ninde and wife have been in charge. The Presiding Elder of the Madeira Islands, Rev. William G. Smart, and wife, have rejoiced in recent reinforcements of the missionary staff, Rev. Herbert J. Calkins of Iowa and Rev. B. R. Duarte and wife from New Bedford, Mass. Dr. Smart states that not long ago the British and Foreign Bible Society of London sent a colporteur to sell Portuguese Scriptures in Madeira. He remained ten weeks and sold 120 Bibles, about 200 New Testaments and 355 portions of the Scriptures. He says: "I advised him to go to Santa Cruz, nine miles from Funchal. He went and sold several Bibles there. A priest followed him and gave him a severe reprimand, and the next day, Sunday, after mass, the priest gathered together the Bibles which had been sold and burned them in the presence of applauding crowds.

The American squadron of four cruisers recently visited Funchal, many of the sailors showing marked interest in the mission house and missions. Bishop Hartzell reports that religious tracts are distributed among 90,000 sailors in seventeen different languages.

Notwithstanding persecution, the missionaries and native Christians are much encouraged to continue their evangelistic efforts. Bishop Hartzell has received two contributions, amounting to $6,000, toward the purchase of the central mission now rented at Funchal, which, together with necessary improvements, will cost nearly $25,000.

A GHASTLY CATASTROPHE

Sermon by REV. F. DEWITT TALMAGE, D.D. Text, Psalm 46 : 3 : "Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled

UPON a curtain of one of the public places of amusement in the city of Chicago is a beautiful picture of the "White City" of the National Exposition of 1893. Underneath this wonderful vision are written these words: "And should I live a thousand years, I never can forget it."

This was the sentence which sprang to my lips when I sat down to write the horrible experience of the most momentous day of my life. But now, instead of seeing beautiful white buildings with their columns and domes and minarets, and hearing the sweet notes of the most famous musicians in the world played in the gardens, and hearing the songs and the merrymakings of the happy parties which filled the gondolas of that new Venice of the West, I saw a sinking ship crowded with men and women. I saw life-boats filled to the gunwales with helpless human beings. I saw the wreckage drifting everywhither. And above all, in imagination, I could see the white faces of men, women and children coming to the surface of the merciless ocean, eagerly looking to see whether their loved ones had been saved and then disappearing into those depths from which only the archangel's resurrection trumpet can now bring them forth. Should I live a thousand years, I can never forget it. Perhaps even in heaven, I shall yet talk over the horrors of that day with some who won the crown of martyrdom when the Columbia, one of the finest ships on the Pacific Ocean, collided with the lumber boat San Pedro, and then blew up and added one more tragedy to the long list of marine catastrophes.

It was on a beautiful summer afternoon, July 20, 1907, that we set sail from that gem of harbors and passed through the Golden Gate of the Pacific at San Francisco. For weeks and months I had been preparing and looking forward to the time when, with my boy and a couple of dear friends, I could drop work and camp for a few weeks in the famous forests of northern California. The sea never looked more peaceful, the sky never more bright. Hard, grinding work for a little while was to be cast aside. No telephone. No telegraph. No callers. No mail. No engagements to speak. I was just to listen to the music of the woods and lie away to the secret haunts of the deer. For hours we paced the deck. Then the sun sank to the west, and the moon began to pave the crystal pavements of the deep with nuggets of gold. Silently, yet relentlessly, the dense fog banks began to shut out the lofty hills to our right. Then the hoarse and reverberating and irritating foghorn began to blow. "Well," I said to one of my friends, "no sleep to-night. I have traveled all round the world. I have been months and months upon the sea, and yet I could never understand why the sailors would persist in blowing that foghorn. The sea is so wide and the ships so few, I do not believe there is any more danger of a collision than there is of shooting a deer in the woods if you lift your gun at random and shut your eyes and pull the trigger and know not where the ball will fly." My traveling companion said nothing. He always has that rebuking silence when I have made any statement which is in self-evident defiance of all the laws of common sense. I went to bed in disgust. Hardly would I get to sleep when I would be awakened with the foghorn's call, "Look out! There is danger! Look out!" At five o'clock in the morning I arose and went on deck and ate some fruit. Then I returned to my stateroom and crawled into bed with my little boy. I had not been there more than ten minutes when I heard a rapid pattering of feet and the sharp command of the officers. I again arose. As I looked out of the stateroom, I said, "What is the matter?" Then the officer, pointing ahead, said, "Look!" I looked, and, oh God! I saw the saddest sight of my life. There was a small lumber boat which seemed to be "turning turtle." Its decks were simply swarming with people. Yonder were lifeboats. Here were rafts. Here were loose, floating lifepreservers. A collision had clearly taken place. But where was the other ship? With that, the men, and the women, and the children, seeing the relief coming out of the fog-bank, raised a cheer of thanksgiving. But for us on the George W. Elder, we could raise no cheer. The scene was too tragic.

The "San Pedro" After Collision, with Rescued Passengers Aboard One of the "Columbia's" Boats The "Elder," with the Half-Sinking "San Pedro" in To

Then the work of rescue. As our great ship was rolling this way and that, the boats came up. Some of the poor victims were covered with blood. Some were too exhausted even to look. Some were rescued only with their night garments, and some had only a blanket around them. From the time the Columbia was struck to the time she sank, it took only ten minutes to lay her broken bones in the bottom of the sea.

"Stand back there! Stand back, or you will sink their boats!" cried the chief officer. "Here, put that rope around this woman! Now, lift this old man up! Now, here is a child! Now, for the other boat!" Then the empty boats would go back again for their loads of suffering. Poor, poor things! Some of them—delicate women—came up with only a drenched cloak to shield their bodies. Some fainted dead away as they were being hauled up. Some even then were weeping. "Oh God, my baby!" "Oh God, my husband and my children!" "Oh God, my wife and my two children!" It was a scene of pathos passing all human description. I saw strong men standing there with the tears running down their cheeks—brave women crying like babies.

I have often stood in the presence of death, but never did I witness death so merciless and cruel as on that sad, sad day. What is the actual extent of the catastrophe I know not. But at the present writing I have been told that there were at least one hundred and five lost of the two hundred and twenty-five souls t the Columbia carried on board. God pity the brol hearts of that night's awful work! God pity the c dren who have been bereft of their parents' love care! God pity the wrecked homes, the wrecked liv

As a pastor and Christian preacher, I learned m Gospel lessons from this heart-rending tragedy. Her deeds of self-sacrifice were revealed on every ha With but one or two exceptions, it did not seem to as though there was a coward or a mean and contem ible soul among all the three crews and passengers the San Pedro, the Columbia and the George W. El who met in such close and holy association on that fa day. I have heard some people declare that this i mean and contemptible world; but if such cynics h only been standing with me on the deck of that res ing steamer on July 20 they would have had th faith in God and in mankind renewed or inspired wit flaming enthusiasm.

That noble heroism, with the first call of danger, w revealed in the conduct of the commander of the ill-fat steamer Columbia, Captain P. R. Doran, now of bless memory. It would have been a very easy matter him to have saved himself. But he went to the captai bridge and stood there. He ordered all the lifeboats be lowered. Then, while he bade others save themselv he himself with his own hand rang the danger signa While he was ringing those signals he seemed to calling: "My passengers and crew, save yourselv Some one must die to warn you; I am willing. Sa yourselves! Save yourselves!" What a glorious dea he died! What a blessed heritage he has given to dear ones! For all time his name will be emblazon upon the "honor list" of those who have given the lives in order that their fellow men might live.

The captain's heroism found its counterpart in the li of many a humble passenger and sailor, in how ma only the great Honor Book of Heaven shall ever recor I heard of one woman who did not know how to swi She had a life-preserver on and could therefore ke afloat. While the boat was coming to get her she grasp two women's skirts and clutched them in her teeth; th with her right hand she reached out and caught a sin ing man. When the sailors pulled her into the boa she, with her woman's courage, had saved three huma lives. This heroism was sometimes found in the mo unexpected places. After all the survivors had be brought on board the George W. Elder, a young g came and sat by my side. Her whole life seemed have been that of a frivolous social butterfly. She laugh and joked. I said to myself: "How can any one mak light of this horror?" Yet a short time afterward, gentleman told me that this young girl, who seemed be out of place except as a creature of fun, was so bra that at the risk of her life she had reached out of th boat and with her own frail hands drawn a drownin man over the gunwale and saved him. Oh, do not te me that this is a mean and selfish world! It is a wor filled with heroes and heroines, when a human life standing face to face with death. If you had been o

The Pleasure City's Narrow Escape

When the Smoke of the Great Conflagration had Cleared Away

After the Great Fire—the Ruins Still Smoking

Watching the Coney Island Fire from a Steamer's Deck

A FEW days ago it appeared as if visitors to Coney Island, New York's favorite place for recreation, would only have the island to gaze at for amusement for the rest of the summer. A fire broke out in the Cave of the Winds in Steeplechase Park, at about four in the morning, and spread so rapidly in the flimsy structures that make up the "city of odds and ends" that it seemed as if every building was doomed. A watchman first saw a little flicker of light, and then with a roar the whole front of the park broke into flame. The firemen at first fought a losing fight, though over a hundred nozzles were brought into action, and spouted streams of salt water into the tottering mass of ruins. Thousands of people ran from their homes. One woman crazed with fright carried her baby by the ankle. A policeman stopped her and put the infant right end up. One man, thinking he had rescued a child, rushed to the police station with a monkey wrapped in a blanket.

An off-shore breeze sprang up and the fire was slowly mastered. The people regained their senses and began to take an account of stock. Twenty-five acres had been swept clean. Houses, hotels, show places had gone up in smoke and blown out to sea. The loss was over a million and a half.

The greater part of the town, however, still remained, with Luna Park and Dreamland. That night the excursionists came as usual, and Coney Island forgot her burns in a "Trip to the Moon" and in watching with wild excitement the people who are engulfed every night by the comfortable looking waters of the "Johnstown Flood."

at tossing, tumbling sea to the south of Cape Mendocino when the Columbia sank, you would have known it. But another fact which impressed me on that fatal day was the realization that those who truly suffer the worst suffer in absolute quietude. It is only the shallow brook that gurgles and splashes and makes a noise; the deep waters of trouble, like a great river, roll quietly and soothly. Oh, the profound, the gloomy silence and yet the overpowering sorrow of that sad line of haunting faces of the shipwrecked passengers and crews lying in the berths of the George W. Elder after they reached the rescuing ship!

I went to many of these berths and heard nearly everywhere the same kind of gratitude. To one I would take clothes, for many of the survivors had nothing; to others I would carry food; with others I would offer a prayer. "Have you lost any one?" I asked a gentle lady whose young eyes haunted me. "Yes; my baby," she answered. "Is your husband safe?" "No," she answered; "I have no husband; I am a widow." Yes, she had lost her all. Only He who raised up that only son of his mother, and she a widow, could comfort her. Yet there she lay, not uttering one word of complaint. Like a wounded animal, she was suffering in silence.

I saw a man who had set sail from San Francisco with his wife and two children. Just before the Columbia sank, each parent took a child. When the awful plunge came, the biggest child was snatched out of the father's arms. The mother and the baby never came up. Yet that man said hardly a word. While he suffered, he suffered in silence. But to hear some people complain about their little troubles, you would suppose that their finite worries were the greatest troubles in all the world. Ah, my brother, when you go around and advertise your grief, I am sure about one thing: the trouble which you have does not amount to much. If you had been on the sinking Columbia and heard the awful explosion when the cold waters touched the hot boilers, and if you had had your wife and children swept away, then you would have had a grief too great to parade before your fellow men. Then, when you suffered, you would suffer in silence, in complete silence, in sacred silence. And I sometimes fear that if we persist in complaining about our little troubles, God may soon send us a truly great trouble in order to stop our continual complaint.

But there was another fact that impressed me about the ghastly catastrophe of the fatal 20th day of July. I felt that we might be very near to those who are in trouble, and yet not hear their cries of anguish, or see their beckoning calls, or be a part in their physical, mental, moral, spiritual and eternal rescue. We may be so near that we can almost speak to them; so near that we are almost treading upon them. And yet, as far as we are concerned, they may be a thousand miles—aye, ten thousand miles away.

The San Pedro struck the Columbia about 12.15 A.M. At 12.30 the Columbia sank, and her passengers and crew were struggling in the water. Two or three of the survivors showed me their watches filled with water; they had stopped about 12.30 A.M. For five long hours in the cold and the darkness, the survivors floated in boats and on rafts, waiting for the day. The fog was still blindingly heavy. About five o'clock in the morning, the passengers in the boats saw a large vessel loom up in the distance. It was only a few hundred yards away. "Thank God!" they cried; "we are saved! we are saved!" But instead of stopping its engines it moved steadily on and disappeared. The survivors were frantic. They called; they shouted; they screamed; but the watchman on the bridge saw them not, and the vessel moved swiftly on and was gone. Then the fog-bank closed down and no human voice answered their cries. Women fainted and men groaned and despair was everywhere. "No hope!" they cried; "No hope! No hope! We shall all be lost in this impenetrable fog." Now, the sailors and the passengers of that passing ship may have been as true-hearted people as those who were aboard the Elder; but they were not looking for any shipwrecked crews, otherwise they might have acted differently.

On the night of July 20, not one of all the passengers and crew aboard the Elder had to be told how near death was. We all felt his presence. We were all saying to ourselves, "How would I have been prepared to meet my God, if my summons had come as it did to the passengers of the Columbia? Am I living the right life, and will my dear ones beyond, by Jesus' side, be able to greet me if I should now hear the call: 'This night, this night thy soul shall be required of thee'?"

In the evening hours of that day some of the survivors of the Columbia came to me and asked with sad faces: "Will you hold a service to-night in the saloon for us?" "Do you want it?" I asked. "Are not the people too high-strung and overwrought and sorrowful to meet at this time?" "No," they answered, "we want it and we want you to lead it." "Well, I will." Never was there a gathering exactly like it. Most of us had eaten but little that day. Many of us had not even washed; we were unshaved and unkempt. But oh, the solemnity of it! Some had no clothes except a blanket. Some had lost babies and husbands, or wives and mothers and fathers. There we met and prayed and sang. I read the twenty-first chapter of Revelations and talked about heaven and our dear ones. There we were, Catholics and Protestants, in that strange audience, and perhaps some who had never yet spoken the name of Christ in reverence. There we prayed, and sang, and wept, and we consecrated our lives anew to God and our fellow men.

It is so easy to think of death coming to those a thousand miles away. But that day it came near to us. Can you not feel that death may this moment be ready for you? Why not now surrender your heart to God's work, as we did on that Sabbath night which followed the awful catastrophe of the sinking Columbia? Then indeed we may say in the words of the Psalmist: "God is our refuge and strength; a very present help in trouble; therefore will we not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof."

TUAN-FANG, LORD OF EIGHTY MILLIONS

How the Great Chinese Viceroy Received THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Commissioner

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

TUAN-FANG, aged fifty, husband of a number of wives—a round dozen some averhigh in the confidence of the Imperial Court at Peking, viceroy of the Liangkiang Provinces and holder of most honorable degrees, is lord of the high, the low, and the middle justice over 80,000,000 of people. Except in matters affecting the interests and incomes of the reigning dynasty, Tuan-fang is absolute. He can condemn to death or exalt to high rank. Aforetime, he dared even to disobey the mandates of the aged and imperial dowager, Tsi-An, for at the time of the Boxer insurrection, the Empress told him (he was viceroy of Honan and Shen-si) to put all foreigners to death. Instead of so doing, he saved the lives of hundreds, and, in all probability, those of Emperor, Empress and the lords and courtiers of the frightened dynasty. To him the Empress finally fled for succor against the wrath of the very rebels she had hoped to placate with foreign blood.

Tuan-fang's kingdom—for few are as really king as he—stretches for more than 1,000 miles north and south, and is full 500 broad at its narrowest. It embraces the great province of Kiang-su, which borders the Eastern Sea, and is probably the richest, as it certainly has the most learned men of the empire; the larger Anhui to the west, and the still larger Kiang-si to the southwest. In this realm Shanghai is the principal port and commercial centre, Hankow, 600 miles up the Yangtse, the most populous, and Nanking (which means, literally, "Southern Capital"), the most important historically.

Systematic Method of Distributing the "Buford's" Cargo

The Viceroy's Inscription

As representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I bore a letter of introduction to his Excellency the viceroy from Sir Chentung Liang-Cheng, H. I. M. Minister to the United States, and as such representative and, as well, as that of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD's editor and proprietor, and of the donors of the Buford's cargo of flour, it was ordered that I should be received in the viceregal yamen, "with all honor and respect," at eleven o'clock on the morning of yesterday, "the fourth day of the fifth moon, and the day preceding the great festival of the dragon."

By direction of the viceroy, Taotai Yung of Chinkiang, had called upon me on my return from the famine district, and after overwhelming me with civilities and insisting that I should accept another feast from him, had asked me the date of my purposed arrival in Nanking that he might arrange a reception by telegraph. This he did, and at half-past ten A.M., in company with Mr. T. Haynes, U. S. Consul at Nanking, and Mr. M. A. Walker of the Chinkiang Missionary Committee (a ripe Chinese scholar and admirable linguist), I set out for the drive through the great city of Nanking to the yamen, with its four poles and lanterns betokening vicerigal rank.

Arrived at the yamen, we were ushered into the inner court through ranks of khaki-clad soldiers, who saluted stiffly after the German fashion, and were greeted on the threshold of the real palace by Taotai Wan, of whom a word. Wan (pronounced Won) was sent to the United States by the missionaries when a lad and spent nine years in study in New England, graduating finally at the Worcester (Mass.) Technological School. He is, or was, a member of the Methodist Church, announces himself as "practically American," speaks English better than the average man in our own land, is progressive, diplomatic, ambitious, cordial, and may or may not be sincere (I've heard varied versions of his sincerity). At all events, he was most kind and courteous to me, and Mr. Walker bore testimony to the accuracy of his translations.

Mr. Wan apologized for the viceroy, saying he would have met us in person, but for a most pestilent lumbago from which he was suffering. He said further, that on receipt of the advisory telegram from Taotai Yung, the viceroy had ordered accommodations to be reserved for me at the only foreign hotel in Shanghai and had sent carriages for us to the river side, but had missed us by reason of our unexpectedly early arrival. For this unfortunate circumstance of missing us he also expressed deep regret.

Without further ceremony Wan ushered us into one of the principal reception-rooms—a large apartment, carpeted with matting and furnished with carved chairs and inlaid tables—where tea was instantly served.

As an evidence of "respect and regard," the viceroy did not keep us waiting more than five minutes (I am told that foreigners and natives often have to sit for hours, possessing their souls in patience, ere his Excellency deigns to greet them), his approach being heralded by great commotion outside. He entered with very slow steps and many groans, his elbows in the grasp of a couple of secretaries, but straightened to his feet as I stepped forward, and, holding out his hand, said:

Viceroy H. E. Tuan-fang

"Sir, I am very glad you have done me the honor to visit me. I am more sorry than I can tell that I am not in better bodily health, so that I could show the representative of America's and CHRISTIAN HERALD's great genero how deeply I appreciate their g and his goodness in coming so with food for the suffering Chines

His Excellency was plainly suffering, and upon informing us that he was under the care of four nat and one foreign physician, I was glad when a lot servants had fixed a chair with half a dozen cushion plaited reeds bound with silk—so that he could rest a half-sitting, half-standing position.

Tuan-fang is a Manchu, and under more favora auspices would doubtless be an impressive figure. A was, truth compels the statement that he was more kempt than one is wont to expect of men in h station. His hair was untidy and bound round b somewhat dingy fi of black silk. I somewhat puffy f was sallow, and sparse chin beard a mustache did not g dignity to his co tenance. Neither they conceal, howev the pleasing lines his mouth, while eyes were lustrous a expressive. His ro was of the bedcha ber (a long and shap less garment of bl silk, rather dingy th otherwise), and he d not wear or show a insignia of his exalt rank. He turned where I was seated his right, forced a sm through a grimace pain, and said:

"I greet you wi deep respect and gra tude, in that you ha come so many tho sands of miles to bri flour to my hung people. I feel, si (placing his hand on his heart) "to my deepest being, h kind THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and Dr. Klopsch, its edito have been. They have won the gratitude not only the Chinese people but of Chinese officials, and the thoughtfulness will never be forgotten. I ask you convey my thanks to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to i proprietor and to all Americans who have remembere China so wonderfully. It is wonderful what they hav done. We will never forget it."

I replied that Americans in general and THE CHRI TIAN HERALD in particular were glad to give tangib evidence of their high regard and sympathy for th Chinese. I intimated that material aid such as th sent on the Buford and furnished before by means o gold drafts would do more than could any words t remove misunderstandings and foster friendships, an concluded by wishing his Excellency long life, muc happiness and successful rulership.

Again the viceroy expressed his deep gratitude. H repeated the words used above several times in the cor versation, and then asked me about conditions in th famine district, state of crops, how the officials wer behaving toward the relief work and when the distribu tions would close. After I had given him all the per tinent information I had, and had been thanked there for with stately courtesy, Mr. Wan said:

"His Excellency has been much perturbed of lat over stories that have reached him that, in the vicinit of Tsingkiangpu, parents have eaten their own children or have sold them to others for food. Can you tell hin anything about the truth or falsity of these stories?"

I was able to say that the same stories had bee brought to the ears of the missionaries, who had mad careful investigation. They were able to disprove th tales in almost all instances. There was one authenti cated case of parents exhuming and devouring the body of their child, and this after it had been buried severa days. There were also a few cases, fairly well proven in which parents had sold children to those who were starving and might eat them; but all the cases, terrible as they were, were exceptional, and it was the belief of those best calculated to know, that such parents must have been driven crazy by hunger and sickness.

Tuan-fang said he was glad to hear that the stories were exaggerated, adding: "The suffering is awful enough and the more I hear of it the more grateful is heart over what your people have done. Tell the aders of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from me that they ve saved thousands upon thousands of lives and earned loving reverence of hundreds of thousands of my ople. Surely they are noble in their instincts and rthy of all admiration."

Very near to the hearts of the working missionaries Kiang-su is the project of establishing orphanages in ich a small fraction at least of the little ones bereft the famine could be cared for, not only physically t spiritually. The missionary committee in Chinkiang, . Henry and Dr. Fred Woods and many others, hear- g that I was to see the viceroy, begged me to intro- ce the subject of orphanages in the conversation, and t from him, if possible, an expression thereanent. is an open secret that officials, thus far, have not en favorable to orphanages, but the relief work ade possible by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has softened many official hearts and mended the anners of so many mandarins, that pes were entertained that there would no active opposition, by persons of al influence, against the orphanage an.

I took up the question, first with r. Wan, then with the viceroy, and peated the plans suggested by various issionaries. I said the orphanages, if y were established, would be under e guidance of the men who had rned such favor by their conduct of e relief work; that the saving of lit- e children from want, from disease, om possible crime, was very near to e hearts of these men and women, ho had not feared to go into fever- ricken homes to save lives; that it as thoroughly understood there should e nothing secret about such asylums r the orphaned, but that they would e open to investigation at any and ll times, and this by the people at rge, as well as by the officials and entry. Then I told him (and when t was interpreted I saw him nod his ead in vigorous approbation) of the abies saved by THE CHRISTIAN HER- LD contributions for milk and infant od, of the appeal the needs of the hildren made upon American hearts, nd of the joy it would give the mis- ionaries could they secure good bring- ng up and fair education for even a mall share of the little ones the famine has left in utter loneliness, desolation and want.

The viceroy did not at once reply. He considered quite deeply and then said:

"The plan you have outlined, and which, as I understand it, is only suggested, appeals to every father. It is a noble plan and does honor to those who have conceived it. However, I suggest that it would be best that the gentry, the elders in the districts where the orphans live and where the missionaries are, should memorialize me. The request should come from those who know best about conditions and about the temper of the people."

That was the best I could get on the subject of orphanages. Evidently the viceroy's sufferings were great, and several times we tried to take the courteous farewell sip of tea, but he always stopped us and again declared his gratitude. Finally he sent word for two of his secretaries to bring the Chinese pen of camel's hair and ink-well of stone, spread with thin, black paste. They brought two finely engraved portraits of Tuan-fang (made for him in Boston, he told us) and large scrolls on which were printed facsimiles of hieroglyphic inscriptions secured by the viceroy while visiting Egypt early last year. Upon the portraits he autographed his name and titles, working out the intricate Chinese characters with wonderful deftness and accuracy, and upon the scrolls the several names of Dr. Klopsch, editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and of myself, with his own name and offices, a short description of the hieroglyphics and a further expression of thanks for the flour. Scrolls and portraits were handed us with many expressions of good will, and Mr. Wan, Consul Haynes and Mr. Walker assured us that the giving of the autographed scrolls and portraits was indication of the viceroy's intent to pay the very highest honor to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the donors of the flour cargo.

Ere we finally made our adieus, the viceroy said: "I much regret that my illness will prevent my giving you a feast, as I had intended, nor can I return the visit with which you have honored and pleased me. Mr. Wan will return the call as my representative. I wish for you all and for Dr. Klopsch, for your families and for all who gave toward the flour, health and prosperity. May you have a safe voyage home and be able to tell your people of our gratitude and praise."

The viceroy was supported to the threshold of his yamen, where we bade the final farewell, and the interview was over.

I have written a good deal of Taotai Yung of this city—a man of great prominence and influence, and a warm personal friend of Viceroy Tuan-fang, whom he knew when he (Yung) was prefect of Tientsin. He is determined that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall be well apprised of his feelings anent the Buford's cargo, and has taken steps to show his appreciative regard. To-night at his yamen he entertained me at a Chinese feast, which, from the delicacies served, must have cost him heavily. I urged him not to give this second feast, but he replied: "The first was to welcome you and was most unworthy: the second is in my own home, where you are a welcome guest. This is a farewell feast but not farewell. I shall call upon you on Tuesday before you leave Shanghai and give you messages for the good ones across the big ocean—the good ones who remembered Chinamen who were hungry and sent them food. I cannot do too much for the representative of these good ones; the representative who has come so many thousand miles to see us and to help our needs."

As we sat at meat this evening an eagle lighted on a bronze dragon just outside the window of the dining hall and gravely watched us. "Behold the good omen," quoth the Taotai. "That is your bird. He comes to wish our friendship well and to set the seal of his approval on our gratitude."

I mention all these things because missionaries and laymen who know China through residence therein for many years, are in accord in saying that prior to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD relief they would have been impossible. Never before has a Chinese official shown such cordial appreciation of foreign help, of outside sympathy. It is a sign of awakening brotherhood, and those who can best understand it are best pleased. That America has done well for itself, as well as worthily for humanity, time and the event shall surely prove.

Let me restate, as succinctly as may be, the past, the present and the probable future.

The famine may have cost a million lives. There are those who say that twice that number have died in Anhui, eastern Honan and northern Kiang-su.

The relief saved a million lives, and was distributed with commendable impartiality, exactness and success in the larger part of the famine-affected territory embraced within the limits of Kiang-su. Little was done in Anhui, because of official opposition; nothing, so far as I can learn, in far off Honan. At present the relief—except in individual instances where poverty and sickness demand constant help—is largely confined to the northern part of Kiang-su province.

The harvest is irregular, in some portions very good, in others, especially to the northward, very poor. Disease is rife. Already three of the foreign helpers have died, at least half a dozen are ill (one or two dangerously so) and, it is feared, fatalities among the missionaries are to be looked for hereafter.

There is no one to distribute relief throughout the hot summer months save the missionaries, and they are all exhausted—many of them on the verge of collapse. They must have rest and surcease of sorrow or not one of the active ones in the interior will live through the next three months. When I think of what I saw in a few short days of misery, disease and death, and remember what these men and women—yes, and their children—have been through since January 1, I am amazed both at what they have accomplished and at their having lived to accomplish it.

Now that the Buford's cargo is all safely in the hands of the destitute, all the missionaries who can will go to Kiukiang, a mountain resort between Nanking and Hankow, where 5,000 feet of elevation, pure air and cool temperature will do much in the way of resuscitation.

The end is not yet. There will be famine, destitution, suffering, disease throughout the summer (owing to past conditions and sparse crops), and accented calamity next fall and winter. The Shanghai and Missionary Committees will have a financial surplus—how large no one knows as yet. It will be needed, and will not suffice to stem even one stream of the torrents of terror and suffering that are bound to flow over the afflicted region of Kianpeh within the next twelve months.

Overworked Missionaries

March 1st I was called to Kiang-su province by a telegram from Dr. James Woods to assist the workers there in giving out the first supplies received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. On May 20 I received another call to come down and help again in the distribution of the last supplies sent from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The plan was to give out tickets to deserving families before the flour arrived so as to be ready to distribute many thousands of bags in a day. I went to a place called Lai An ("coming peace") to superintend the building of two large waterways eight miles long. I began work on Monday with 6,000 men, and on Tuesday I added 4,000 more. The care and the paying of ten thousand men was no easy task when you consider that almost all of their wages was paid to them in copper cents. In one day there was paid out $9,000 in copper, making 18,500 lbs. weight, taking six coolies to pass it over the counter and keep tally. The next day I helped give out 2,000 bags of flour and $2,000 cash to the needy poor.

India Sends Aid to China

AMERICAN BAPTIST TELUGU MISSION,
SECUNDERABAD, DECCAN, INDIA, June 19.

I am sending you by this mail a money order for £1. 8s. 2d., a contribution to the China Famine Fund. The money was contributed under the initiative of the mission church in this station, under the control of the American Baptist Missionary Union. Part of the money was contributed by the Telugu Christians, part by the members of the English congregation, part by soldiers of the garrison and part by the missionaries. One of the families constituting the English church made a very liberal donation. (REV.) FRANK H. LEVERING.

The Palace of Peace

WHILE many are doubting whether any practical result will come from the Hague Conference, a substantial proof of the faith of the optimists has been given. The delegates assembled the other day, and with appropriate ceremonies laid the foundation stone of the edifice in which the Conference will have permanent headquarters. Critics will doubtless tell us that this is beginning at the wrong end, and that the Conference has not yet demonstrated its need of a permanent habitation. But happily the critics and the statesmen who delight in war are being gradually discredited by thinking people in all lands. They will learn sooner or later that the Christian public, at any rate, is bent on promoting peace, and will do all that is possible to facilitate the judicial settlement of quarrels between nations. It is a clear step in this direction to have a beautiful building in which the courts of arbitration may hold their sessions with dignity. This step is rendered possible by Mr. Andrew Carnegie's gift of a million and a half dollars for the erection of the edifice now commenced. We must expect obstacles to be raised at every stage in the attempt to abolish the practice of war, but these are gradually being surmounted, and in the end must disappear before the quiet determination of the followers of the Prince of Peace.

The Haywood Verdict

ABLE lawyers who have been close observers of the evidence in the case against William D. Haywood, charged with complicity in the murder of ex-Governor Steunenberg of Idaho, do not seem to share in the general surprise which has been expressed at the verdict of acquittal. To prove a conspiracy upon satisfactory evidence is one of the most difficult problems of criminal law. The chain of evidence must be complete and unassailable. In the Haywood trial, outside of Orchard's revelations, it was incomplete. While many things adverse to the accused were apparently proved beyond question, the one vital charge that he incited the murder which took place while he was hundreds of miles away, was not absolutely established.

Orchard was introduced as a witness who was to prove a criminal conspiracy by the mouth of one of the conspirators. But the testimony of an accomplice is frequently of doubtful value. In the present case the defense imputed a motive amounting to a counter conspiracy, but the imputation received little consideration. Orchard's testimony was of such a monstrous character as to be virtually incredible, and it carried its own antidote. It was the voluntary confession of the most astounding criminal of the age, a self-acknowledged thief, perjurer, conspirator and murderer—a man who, on his own admission, is unfit to live among civilized human beings. It is not supposable that any fair-minded jury would have convicted any one on such testimony, especially if such conviction meant sending the accused to the electric chair or the gallows. His exhibition of utter depravity produced a revulsion, and he was discredited altogether. He overdid his part, and Judge Wood, in his charge to the jury, plainly intimated that the testimony of a man so directly interested in putting the responsibility for his own crimes on the shoulders of others must be strongly corroborated by other testimony, which should be sufficient of itself to convict.

The whole trial is a startling commentary on the lawlessness and violence that prevail in certain sections of the country, and especially in the mining regions. It carries a lesson to both capital and labor, which we trust will not be without some good result.

The Armenian "Terrorists"

NEW York has had more than its share of lurid sensations this summer; but its conflagrations, "crime waves" and "Black Hand" assaults have all been temporarily overshadowed and eclipsed by the recent disclosures, revealing the existence of a secret Armenian society of blackmail and assassination. This mysterious criminal organization, with its oath-bound members, its threatening letters to rich Armenian merchants, and its "death warrants" written in blood and emblazoned with the traditional hand and dagger, is an Oriental importation so utterly foreign to American ideas and so atrocious in all its murderous operations, that public opinion has united in an emphatic demand for its suppression and for the swift punishment of its leaders. Some half dozen of the latter are now in jail, and there is a hopeful prospect that the whole band of Oriental outlaws, who made patriotism a thin pretext to cover up blackmail and murder, will soon be run to earth and made to suffer for their horrible crimes.

There are black sheep in every fold. The great majority of the Armenians who come here belong to the peaceful, industrious, law-abiding class. They have endured so much trouble and persecution at home, that the peace and security our government affords is a welcome change. Many have become naturalized American citizens. Not a few have brought with them to this country their old-world political and religious feuds, and these, unfortunately, have been only too willing to listen to a junta of cunning rascals, who played upon their patriotism for mercenary purposes. Believing they were helping to "free Armenia," these simple, credulous dupes have been pouring their gifts into the treasury of as vile a gang of plunderers as ever cut throat or scuttled ship—a gang whose members have used patriotism as a cloak to cover up the most hideous crimes.

There are two kinds of patriotism. One is open and honorable and has the respect of every right-thinking man; the other Dr. Samuel Johnson denounced as "the last refuge of a scoundrel." For those who are inspired by the spirit of true patriotism, the American people have no censure, as long as they obey our laws and honorably keep the peace. But in this free land, there is no place for those who persist in making it a vantage ground from which to level trouble at the governments of Europe.

We hope that these "Terrorists," whom all good Armenians must hold in abhorrence, will be made to suffer the full punishment of their misdeeds. The good sense and vigilance of the Armenians themselves should make any repetition of these crimes impossible.

A Millionaire's Recipe

SOUND philosophy, by no means new, but significant, considering the character of the man who uttered it, was taught by Mr. John D. Rockefeller in a recent address. He declared that "the only way to be perfectly happy is to do good to others." There is a prevalent idea that if any man has the means of being perfectly happy, it is he who is accounted one of the richest men in the world. It is significant that a man so envied should give this result of his experience. He certainly speaks as one having authority. He knows the advantages of wealth, and is able, if any one is, to give us a just estimate of its value. If the common opinion were true, he would tell us that the way to be perfectly happy is to acquire a large fortune. Men strive for that end, as the best means of becoming happy. At the close of a long life, with abundant means of knowing, Mr. Rockefeller does not even include wealth as one of the ingredients of that coveted cup. Like the ancient preacher, he does not bid us seek happiness by that path. The way to it, according to him, lies within reach of the humblest and most obscure. It lies, too, within reach of the rich and illustrious. The simple way is to do good to others. All may do that. The poor man, who has opportunities of giving a helping hand to a brother when he is in a difficulty; the kindly man, whose cheery word and friendly encouragement help a depressed neighbor to take heart again, does not need a fat bank account. Yet he has the open sesame to the boon every man desires. He may be happy, and assuredly will be, when he forgets his own state, and honestly seeks the benefit of another. Those who have turned a deaf ear to the philosophers and the preachers who have been telling us this for hundreds of years, may listen when a millionaire speaks.

Among the Workers

NEWS HAS BEEN received of the death by drowning of Rev. Warren B. Seabury, and Rev. Arthur S. Mann, missionaries at Kinling, China. Mr. Mann met his death while trying to rescue Mr. Seabury.

REV. J. STUART HOLDEN, pastor of St. Paul's Chapel, Portman Square, London, will be in America this summer. He is announced as one of the leading speakers at the General Conference for Christian workers at Northfield.

EVANGELIST W. R. LANE, who is now working under the New York Evangelistic Committee, was formerly a member of the famous British regiment, the Coldstream Guards. Two years after his conversion, he left the service to dedicate his life to Christian work. He conducted twenty-one missions in twenty-one different cities and towns of England, from September, 1906, to June, 1907.

The Shanghai Committee and the Famine

SHANGHAI, July 6.

DEAR DR. KLOPSCH: The great famine, which ha devastated several prefectures of this province, is no over. The people and officials very highly appreciat all that has been done to save them from a terrible deat at the hands of the hunger fiend.

A great part of the success of our work has been du to your noble efforts, and I wish, in the most positive an hearty way possible, to express to you from our com mittee our very sincere thanks for the wonderful worl you and your widely circulated paper have accomplished

It has been a great pleasure to me personally to mee Mr. E. R. Johnstone, who has so ably represented yo out here. I have found him genial and courteous, an very solicitous to do the best possible for the interest committed to his care.

In parts of the section, fairly good crops have bee reaped; but in all the low-lying lands stretching toward the sea from the old bed of the Yellow River, the harves is of the most meagre description, and there will certainly be a recrudescence of suffering next winter or spring, bu on nothing like the scale of the past year.

We are proposing to wind up our affairs and dissolv the committee during the course of this month. Any fund remaining over will be left in the hands of the American and British Consuls, as a trust fund to be used for any other famine that may occur.

The total amount of contributions realized through our committee and the Chinkiang committee and other sources, reaches a total of $1,600,000 Mexican. Of this sum about $1,000,000 has been realized from America and largely through your good self. We have relieved over 1,000,000 persons with these funds by direct assistance, and very many more by the indirect results which have occurred through our efforts by compelling officials and gentry who hold stocks of foodstuffs to realize at reasonable rates. Great numbers of people in the famine area have thanked our sub-committees for this very reason. A number of them had sufficient money to buy foodstuffs to see them through even at enhanced prices, but not at the terribly inflated rates that were ruling. The vast importation of foodstuffs from our committee compelled holders of grain to reduce their prices, and thus enabled the above class of people to hold out till the harvest.

A very great amount of relief works have been put in, which will tend to ameliorate conditions of life in the country, and in some measure to prevent a recurrence of famine by flood. We shall do our best to persuade the Government to carry on to completion the works so begun.

A further great benefit that will result from this famine work will be the bettering of the relations existing between the Chinese and foreigners. Both sides have come to understand each other better, and have seen another phase of each other's character. I have no doubt whatever that a further result has been the breaking down of anti-foreign barriers, so that missionaries from this time on have an access to the people's attention and hearts, such as has never been known before.

The work has involved, of course, an enormous strain upon us, physically and mentally, and entailed an immense amount of labor; but all have worked well and a very great success has crowned our united efforts.

Yours very sincerely, EDWARD S. LITTLE,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Egyptian Soul-Houses

CLUES to the theology of the ancient Egyptians have been obtained from a recent discovery by Professor Flinders Petrie. In excavating some ancient royal graves, all antedating the Exodus, some of them earlier than the time of Joseph, Professor Petrie discovered some rare specimens of the famous soul-houses. These had been found in various royal tombs by other explorers, but none so elaborate or well-preserved as these. Photographs of these miniature houses appear on this page.

To guess at the use of these dwellings, it is necessary to understand the Egyptian doctrine of the "Ka," to which there are many allusions on the monuments. We themselves speak figuratively of "the life going out of the body" at the moment of death. "The Egyptians," says Miss. Edwards, the learned Egyptologist, "not only believed that the life went out of the body, but that thenceforth it led an independent existence." This was the Ka. Little statues of the dead, closely resembling the body in form and feature, were placed in the tomb with the corpse for the Ka to inhabit. With them were miniature statues of servants to wait on the Ka. As the idea developed, the little houses were provided for the occupation of the Ka, and further development led to the provision of meals for its sustenance. A family would, in some instances, leave an endowment to provide continuous meals for his Ka, and an investment to support priests to care for the mortuary services. The most intense effort was made for the preservation of the body, for it was on its survival, the Egyptian believed, that the immortality of the dead man depended. He hoped for his reunion with his Ka at some distant time, and care was taken that until that time arrived it should feel at home in the body of wood or stone placed with the corpse in the tomb, and in the miniature dwelling provided for its use. Thus the images were as much like the corpse as the artist's skill could make them, and even its defects and deformities were reproduced. Similarly the soul-houses were little models of the deceased's former home. All the trouble and cost of embalming the body and of providing a refuge for the Ka tended in the Egyptian belief to this one object, of perpetuating existence through the ages until there should be reunion of body and soul in renewed life. How thankful they would have been had the revelation of immortality been proclaimed to them!

For we know that, if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. (II. Cor. 5 : 1.)

Houses for the Soul Found in Egyptian Tombs

A Physician's Rights

A significant action is set down for trial in a city of New Jersey. It involves the question whether a physician has the right of using the front door of a house, or must go to the basement door when he visits a patient. The doctor called on a patient, who occupies a flat in an imposing house in an aristocratic district of the city. He was admitted, but as he was entering, the owner or janitor of the house met him and rudely demanded why he had not gone to the basement where tradesmen were expected to go. The doctor stood on his dignity and an attempt was made to eject him by force. He is now suing for the assault and for the injury to his professional reputation. This is part of the effort now being made in this country to introduce caste distinctions, and to treat all who minister to the comfort of others as inferior beings. Even the church is not free from this tendency, in spite of the inspired warning:

If ye have regard to him that weareth the fine clothing, and say, Sit thou here in a good place; and ye say to the poor man, Stand thou there or sit under my footstool: do ye not make distinctions among yourselves? (James 2 : 3, 4, R.V.)

An Armenian Mafia

The murder of a millionaire rug dealer of Armenian nationality in New York, two weeks ago, has led to an investigation of the methods of a revolutionary society. The murderer did not appear to have had any quarrel with his victim, or to have had any personal reason for killing him. It was therefore suspected that there must have been political reason for his act. An investigation was therefore begun by the District Attorney, in which he was aided by respectable Armenians in business in the city. It was learned that within a few hours of the murder, many of them had received letters demanding large sums of money to aid the revolutionists in Armenia. It was evident that the writers believed that such demands would be opportune, as the recipients would be afraid that if they refused they would be murdered, as their fellow countryman had been. It was clear that a murderous society existed in the city. The Armenians called it the Hunchakist Society, but its operations were difficult to trace. It recently split into two parts, one of which was pronounced inoffensive. A priest who claims to have been a member of that branch was arrested, and with him five of his associates. The priest at one time acted as treasurer for the Hunchakist Society. It is believed that the cruel wrongs endured by the Armenians in the Turkish provinces led to the organization of the revolutionary society, and that corrupt and selfish men gained control of it. They cared nothing about freeing their country, but practised a policy of blackmail for their personal advantage, and used the genuine patriots as their instruments. These latter are the dupes of wicked men who bring disgrace on the cause they pretend to represent. It is no new practice.

If they say, Come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurk privily for the innocent without cause: we shall find precious substance, we shall fill our houses with spoil: my son, walk not thou in the way with them. (Prov. 1 : 11-15.)

Poisoned by Money

News comes from the Philippine Islands that an operation has been performed in a hospital at Manila on an officer of the United States Army. It has been necessary to amputate his right arm, owing to septicemia setting in. He is paymaster of the forces, and in the course of his duty it was necessary for him to count large quantities of currency. He had an abrasion of his hand, but it was not so painful as to incapacitate him from work. It did not occur to him that there might be any danger; but it appears that among the bills there must have been some infected with poison. His hand and arm began to swell, and the regimental surgeon sent him to the hospital at Manila for treatment. The doctors there perceived that only the prompt amputation of the arm could save his life. It would appear that there is physical as well as moral danger in the handling of money. In the former case, nature provides a protection in the skin, that, when intact, is a barrier to the infection; in the latter case, moral infection cannot injure if the soul is armed with the protection God provides:

The fear of the Lord is a fountain of life to depart from the snares of death. (Prov. 14: 27.)

A Woman's Vow

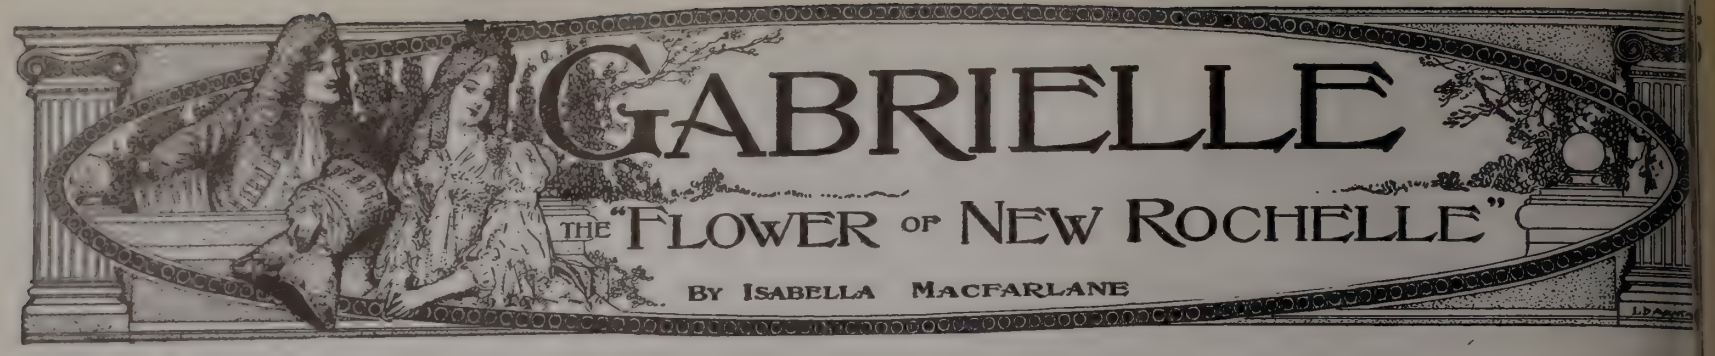
A singular story is told of a lady who died at her home near Lawrenceburg, Ind., recently. She was ninety-five years of age and she had spent more than seventy years of her life in an obstinate feud against all of the male sex. Her former neighbors say that although she had lived all that time in one locality she had never held communication whatever with any man. The explanation of her strange conduct given by her friends is romantic. They relate that in her girlhood she was exceedingly beautiful and attractive. She had many suitors, but the one she favored was a young man who came to teach school one year in another part of the county. He visited her regularly, but at the end of the school term, he went to a distant city and the girl's friends did not see him again. If he wrote to the girl she never mentioned it. From that time she secluded herself. After some years her father died and then her mother. She continued to occupy the old homestead, but no man was ever admitted to her presence. Her female servants made purchases for her and answered inquiries, and carried her messages, and took care that no man ever approached their mistress. She appears to have hated the whole sex and kept them away from communication with her, because of the faithlessness of one member of it. Foolish and illogical as was her conduct, she is said to have been shrewd and intelligent, so we may hope that she could follow and appreciate the reasoning of the Apostle Paul and avail herself of the privileges he described.

As by the offense of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life. (Rom. 5 : 18.)

A Millionaire's Tombstone

A huge granite boulder has been dug up at Cranberry Lake, N. J., and removed to Paterson, N. J., where it is to be placed in the cemetery, on the burial plot of a rich citizen. He is still living, but is anxious that the boulder should stand on the ground where he expects to be buried when he dies. He has a romantic reason for the desire. Fifty years ago he came to this country a poor boy. His poverty was so extreme that he could not raise the fare to Newton, where he had obtained employment, and was obliged to walk thither. At the noon hour he was somewhat tired and hungry. He had a frugal lunch with him and sat down on this boulder at Cranberry to eat it and rest. He never forgot that day's journey. Now that he is president of several transportation companies, and a director of two banks, he is in a position to indulge any reasonable desire. Going to Cranberry, he easily found the boulder and made arrangements to purchase it. The railroad company, however, declined to transport it, unless the millionaire would pay for the construction of a special car. This he did, and the stone is now on the way to Paterson. The cost of the stone and the expense of its removal are said to exceed ten thousand dollars. It will be a memento of a successful life, extending from the poverty of the youthful immigrant to the wealth of the aged millionaire. It may be hoped, however, that he has more than that kind of success to boast of, otherwise the stone will be a symbol only of worldly triumph. When the time comes that his body is laid underneath it, it will be well for him if he has the assurance that comforted that ancient immigrant who also made the stone on which he rested in his youth a memorial:

Then shall the Lord be my God, and this stone which I have set for a pillar shall be God's house. (Gen. 28 : 21, 22.)



GABRIELLE

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

BY ISABELLA MACFARLANE

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but leaves a note on the fly-leaf of a psalm-book explaining his plight. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. With her cousin Rosalie she attends the festival of the crowning of the Rosiere. While there, Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Rebuffed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Her father leaves. Gabrielle takes long walks through the forest to be alone with her grief. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship.

CHRISTINE was accompanied by her two "assistants," Jeanne and Marie, who carried between them another great basket of clothes. The girls, being of that age when

"The tear, forgot as soon as shed, Leaves no corroding mark behind," enjoyed the affair immensely, thinking it a great frolic. The ruse succeeded admirably, no one suspecting anything, and the old woman and the girls were safely stowed away in the cabin.

The next thing in order was a sedan chair, carried on board by David and his son Raoul as "freight," being carefully done up in canvas, and consigned conspicuously to a well-known furniture-dealer in Plymouth, England. But the "consignment" only carried it as far as the cabin, when the canvas coverings were taken off, and out of it was lifted the fragile form of the invalid wife and mother.

The old grandmother, with sturdy independence, refused to avail herself of any subterfuge for getting on board.

"You shall not pack me in any bale or box or bundle—you shall not disguise me as washerwoman or fishwoman—I shall go on board on my own feet, as a Christian gentlewoman should, trusting in the Providence that has kept me for these eighty-four years."

She was as good as her word. Escorted by her grandson Raoul, her partner at the birthday fête, and leaning on a gold-headed cane that was an heirloom in the family and could by no means be left behind, having been given to her grandfather by the great Huguenot leader, the Prince of Condé—she walked to the pier, and went on board the ship, unmolested by any one.

Raoul himself was not going with them. His being a member of the burghers' corps, it was thought, would preserve him from persecution; and when his term of service expired he could rejoin his family wherever they happened to be settled.

David was to make his way to the ship under cover of night, when all the rest were safe.

They were now all disposed of except Gabrielle, and to accomplish her escape some maneuvring was necessary.

The town in which she was staying being in a flax-growing district, many of the women and girls were engaged in the weaving of home-made linen. There was a handloom in almost every house, on which were woven beautiful webs of linen, which, when finished, were conveyed to La Rochelle, either for home use or foreign export.

Among the most expert of the handloom weavers was Madame Bertrand, and while the mother wove, Rosalie's busy spinning-wheel supplied the thread for the loom.

Twice a month a carrier, named Nicholas Roux, or Redhead, driving a great broad-wheeled wagon drawn by two horses, called at the different houses to pick up his load. The bales of linen were packed in great casks, to protect them from the weather, as Nicholas' wagon had no cover.

With this man it had been arranged that Gabrielle should travel to the coast, there being no other public conveyance.

It was impossible, however, for her to travel openly with the carrier, for, the whole country being patrolled by armed guards, she could not have gone far without being arrested. And besides, the carrier for his own sake would not have dared to run the risk, since to assist a refugee in escaping was to endanger his own life and liberty. It had therefore been planned that she should be packed in one of the casks of linen, unknown to the carrier—a device frequently resorted to in those desperate times.

This particular cask was not to be conveyed all the way to La Rochelle, but was to be left at a fishing village a few miles from that city, called the Three Windmills, in care of a Monsieur Dubois, who was a friend of David de Bonnefoy, and had offered to help him in this strait, though not himself a Huguenot.

Reaching this place about nightfall, Gabrielle, assisted by this friend, would emerge from her place of concealment, and would find at the landing a fisherman with his boat, whom her father had hired to carry her to the ship, which, having left the port to avoid suspicion, was now anchored at some distance from the shore, awaiting her arrival.

On the appointed day, the household of Cousin Pauline arose at three o'clock in the morning. It was necessary that all the preparations should be made, all the tears shed and the adieux exchanged, before the arrival of the carrier. It was necessary that the prisoner should clamber into her narrow cell, and the cask be headed up, but in such manner that sufficient air could be admitted for the inmate to breathe.

With many tears and frequent embracings, the cousins bade their friend farewell, but when she crawled into the cask, and, seating herself in the centre, was heaped up and built around with bales of linen, it was impossible to keep from laughing, and the laugh did them good. It took off the edge of their trouble, and lightened their apprehensions just a little.

"Gabrielle was received with a flutter of excitement"

About daybreak, Nicholas, the red-headed carrier, made his appearance, with his great wagon and strong horses. He had brought a man along with him to help him to load up, but both exclaimed at the weight of Madame Bertrand's cask. Gabrielle from her prison-house could hear Nicholas grumbling and Cousin Pauline lecturing him.

"You must have made some extra heavy linen cloth this time, Madame Pauline; it is all that Jacques and I can do to lift the cask."

"It is the best, the finest material you ever carried from here, friend Nicholas. See that you take good care of it, and deliver it safe into the hands of Sieur Dubois."

"What in the world can the Sieur Dubois want with such a weight of linen?"

"How should I know? Perhaps he wants to sell it. Perhaps he has a daughter about to be married. Perhaps—"

But by this time the cask was in place, and Nicholas, with a word to his horses and a crack of his long whip, started on his journey.

It was a dreary journey for Gabrielle, but the thought of soon rejoining her friends and being removed from all the horrors was some consolation.

The road was very bad, and the continual jolting of the springless wagon hard to bear. Thoughtful Cousin Pauline had filled a little lunch basket for her, and to this, though in the cask, she several times had recourse, with a comforting effect. For, even in the most thrilling moments of our lives, how necessary are our creature comforts!

As the horses traveled at a foot pace the day was well-nigh spent before they approached the coast; but at last, as the rumble of the wagon ceased for a few moments while the carrier was adjusting some part of his harness, Gabrielle heard the welcome sound of the sea, and tried to move the slats that formed the head-ing of her prison, that she might look for the Three Windmills.

They were not yet visible, however.

But in the momentary gleam she saw another object, which struck a chill to her heart—a great, gloomy-looking building surrounded with a high wall and standing back a little from the road. It was a convent, in which she doubted not there were many Huguenot children and young women, undergoing "conversion."

They plodded on a half-mile farther, the road growing worse and worse, for the ground was marshy, and there had been heavy rains.

On a sudden one of the wheels sunk up to the hub in a great mudhole. The wagon lurched fearfully, and the cask in which Gabrielle was confined rolled off into the road.

She uttered a cry of terror.

"Holy Saint Martin! What's that?" exclaimed the carrier.

Then he saw a woman's head protruding from the fallen cask, and a woman's hands struggling frantically to remove the slats that still held her in; and he seemed at once to apprehend the situation.

"Oh! oh!" he cried; "it is the Huguenot girl from Madame Bertrand's! Hélas! Ahi! I have been betrayed! I am ruined! Had I known it, I would not have done it for a thousand livres! No wonder the cask was heavy."

While talking, he was busily engaged in unloosing his horses from the wagon.

"Oh, help me, Nicholas," pleaded Gabrielle. "Help me to get out of this."

But instead of helping her, he flung a volley of oaths and imprecations at her head, and having freed his horses, he mounted one of them, and leading the other, galloped off as fast as he could go, leaving the wagon and its contents in the road.

Gabrielle, left to her own resources, climbed out of the cask as best she could. Though badly shaken, she was not much bruised or otherwise injured by the fall, thanks to the thick padding of linen that lined the walls of her cage, but her limbs were cramped and stiff with remaining so long in one position.

She looked around for some signs of the Three Windmills, but saw none. She could not even tell in what direction they lay, but concluding they must be reached by the road they had been traveling, she walked on. She knew she was drawing

The Working Woman's Holiday

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AFTER one has spent fifty weeks in standing behind a counter, sitting at a typewriter or changing money at a cashier's desk, a fortnight's vacation very welcome. The problem of how to spend it to the st advantage and the twin problem of ways and means 've been matters of thought and discussion during the nter and spring. The working woman has earned her liday and wants to reap from it a harvest of pleasure, well as of renewed strength for future exertion. metimes she is so tired that her craving is for the netest place she can find, with leisure to sit all day der the trees and to pass drowsy hours in contentment, inging softly back and forth in a hammock. Usually e prefers to this absolute quiescence e chance to do something very dif- rent from her year-long occupation hen at home. A dip into the sea, a ive along the beach, perhaps a visit a great Exposition or a trip to a range city are among the fascinating ssibilities of a summer holiday. here are farmhouses in the mountains here the charge for board and lodg- g is not excessive, leaving a little argin over for jaunts and picnics, that nually are popular resorts for work- g women. One friend tells another the good times she had in a recent mmer, and the other writes and akes arrangements, packs her trunk, ys her ticket, and starts with cheer- l hope on a trip to fairyland.

To the summer tourist who has ex- austed every form of simple pleasure e fairyland may be only a rather abby farmhouse with an old piano a ood deal out of tune, family photo- raphs on the walls, and sofas covered ith haircloth; and he may not care for he charming vista of the mountains, for he meadow waving white with buck- heat, for the little river foaming over s bed of stone, or for the country fare f eggs, milk and fish on the breakfast able. The summer tourist who knows he land from one coast to another, to hom the railway train across the con- inent affords the luxuries of a first- lass hotel, cannot understand the de- ight of a short vacation, every hour of hich has been anticipated and will be emembered.

A holiday that has been saved for ittle by little is worth very much more han a holiday that is gained without effort and is merely a device to kill time. When the working girl returns from her holiday there is a new light in her eyes, a new bloom in her face, and a new alertness in her manner. She is glad to be back at the old shop, greets her customers cordially, and accepts the day's work with a reinforcement of courage. She is a unit in a great army, just a private in the ranks. She has never exchanged a word with the heads of the firm, and has nothing to do with the machinery of the business beyond performing her part to the best of her ability. But she is loyal to the core of her being, and because she is loyal, capable and honorable, each day doing her very best, and because there are hundreds like her, the great business goes on smoothly and prospers amain.

As a rule the working woman prefers an independent holiday to one carrying with it the faintest suggestion of charity. At various points on the shore and among the hills there are homes and camps which offer the working girl attractive inducements in the line of rest and refreshment at a comparatively small cost to herself. The trouble with many of these well-meant and well-planned homes is that they are encumbered by restrictions and rules, prohibitions and requirements, that the average girl resents. The ideal of a summer rest for working girls who have very small wages is nearest of attainment when they are carried on by Settlement workers who are in full sympathy with the toilers, live among them and comprehend their needs. No class among us prizes more keenly its self-respect and sets a higher value on its ability to pay its way than that from which our working girls come. There are no young women worthier of regard, abler to stand on their own feet and more useful to the community than those who compose the rank and file of business women.

Many claims press upon them. They have fathers and mothers whom they cheerfully assist, often giving the whole of their weekly earnings to the mother, and reserving for themselves only car-fare and very little besides. A young girl who earns ten dollars a week often leaves the disposition of it entirely to her mother, who buys and makes the daughter's clothing and gives the latter her weekly spending money. When such a girl goes on her vacation she compares favorably as to costume with far richer girls. Her dainty shirtwaists are as crisp and fresh as those of the millionaire's daughter, her skirt is well cut and well hung, her hat and jacket are in the mode.

AN OPEN-AIR RURAL CONCERT

WHEREVER the kingdom of childhood holds court during the long, golden summer days, the "hand-organ man," with the quaint little monkey who is his inseparable companion, is sure to gravitate. From the beautiful summer homes of wealth in which our fair land abounds, the children wander forth to the neighboring fields which are white with daisies, some "fortunate ones of earth" ranging through the woodland paths in dainty pony carts. But when the strains of "Cavalleria" or "The Wearing of the Green" are heard, all other attractions pale for the little ones, before the organ-grinder and his trick monkey. Many are the "ohs!" and "ahs!" of admiration which greet the clever performances of the little animal.

As Easy as an Old Shoe

THE new shoe may be very trim and tidy, and fit so well that the wearer is tempted to push it forward a little that it may be seen and admired. She observes it with complacency as it peeps out from beneath her petticoat, and she has much satisfaction in feeling that her well shod feet make up for other defects in her toilet. French women who possess the art of dressing well, assert that to be well gloved and well shod are the essentials, if one would be well dressed. But there comes a moment at the end of the day when the new shoe is taken off and carefully laid away beside its mate, and the old shoe that has been despised, which is rusty and worn and not a bit elegant, is taken from the closet shelf and again slipped on the foot. The foot blesses it for the ease of old acquaintance. How soft it is! how pliant! how ample and roomy! One breathes a sigh of thankfulness as one settles down to solid comfort in the embrace of the old shoe.

The shoe is not the only thing that is the better for being familiar and a trifle shabby. In the house, when the walls have been newly papered and the doors painted, when the hard-wood floors have been achieved with a satiny surface that responds to polishing, when there are new carpets, new curtains and new furniture, the family plumes itself on its air of respectability, and the house-mother feels a little pride when she entertains neighborly callers. But father and the boys, and mother herself, had more ease when the house was a little shabby. The sun could not hurt the old paint nor fade the old paper, so it poured in all day long and nobody cared. When the lounge was covered with threadbare damask, any one who was sleepy from grandmother to the cat might take a nap without reproof. Along with the new resplendence a new responsibility and a new occasion for care-taking have found the family out, and have driven ease and wont into the background. The house used to be as easy as an old shoe. In these days it is much like a new one.

Who has not dear old friends with whom intercourse is so informal that it implies no burden? The story is related of the two great men of genius, Thomas Carlyle and Alfred Tennyson, that they spent a long evening together, facing each other, on opposite sides of the hearth. They never exchanged a word, but enjoyed each other's company in silence. Afterward they declared that they had had a most delightful evening, and in the mind of each was the impression that the talk had been good. Such intimacy can exist only between people who have known each other well and loved each other truly, and whose friendship fits both with the ease of the old shoe to the accustomed foot.

If one is a book-lover, one does not need to be told that there are books in the library that have lost their pristine freshness of tint and gilding, but that are worth to the hand and eye of their owner much more than the most expensive volume that the bookbinder can turn out to-day. The dear old books have been the solace of weariness, the comfort of sorrow, the companions of journeys, the friends of a lifetime. If one could, one would not replace them by newer editions. They may be dingy and brown, but one prefers Sir Walter Scott and Charles Dickens in the familiar type and binding to the same authors in a more brilliant dress. Even in books it is desirable to know the ease of the old shoe.

nearer the ocean, for its voice sounded in her ears like the voice of a friend, and soon its broad, blue, heaving bosom came in sight, sparkling in the rays of the declining sun.

She saw no one, but observed at intervals the sentry-boxes of the coast patrol. She was congratulating herself on having escaped observation, when suddenly out of one of these small buildings stepped a guard.

"Who goes there?" he said, in military fashion.

"A friend."

"Where are you going?"

"To the Three Windmills."

"That is a mile farther on. But I suspect you will not have to go so far. You do not look like a fisherwoman. Are you a Huguenot?"

"I am of the Reformed Religion."

"Aha!—I thought so. Will you say the Ave Maria, or make the sign of the cross?"

"No."

"Then you must come with me to Saint Mary's Convent yonder. There the good nuns will instruct you in your religious duties and exercises."

Gabrielle's heart sank. The thought of her father and mother and all her friends sailing away to England and to freedom while she remained in the hands of a set of proselyting nuns, filled her with dismay; and, curiously enough, the thought of Captain Girard came with the other thoughts, as she remembered what he had said when she had mentioned such a contingency as the present. He had promised to see her again, but he had not come.

She was received by the nuns with a flutter of excitement.

"Here," said the coast guard, "is a woman of the R. P. R., who, I have reason to believe, was trying to run away. I have brought her to you, good sisters, that she may be led into the right path."

At first the sisters received her with honeyed words, trying by fair means to induce her to recant. Finding her obdurate, they changed their tactics, assuring her that on the morrow Father Ambrose, the confessor of the convent, would be there, and would put her through a course of questions she would not be able to withstand. Failing this, she would then be disciplined—her hair shaved off, her clothes taken away and the gray garment of a novice substituted for them, and her diet reduced to bread and water—until she forsook her heresies, and accepted the holy Roman Apostolic Church as her own.

In the meantime, however, as night was approaching, they desisted, and as they saw she was very tired, took her to the refectory, and gave her a supper of bread and milk, and then consigning her to a cell, left her to herself for the night.

She was tired, it is true, but every faculty was on the alert, every thought was concentrated on one idea—to escape.

"I must escape from this place! I must escape to-night! To-morrow will be too late! Now or never! And, God helping me, I shall try. Even if I die in the attempt, that will be better than to stay in this horrid place, and be subjected to these indignities."

As she had been taken to one part and another of the convent, she had noted several things that seemed to favor the idea of escape. First and most important, she was not locked in, for, as her cell opened into one of the nuns' dormitories, that precaution seemed unnecessary. Then the lonely situation of the convent was favorable. Once outside the building, some time must elapse before the alarm could be given.

When left alone, she sat down on the edge of the hard, narrow pallet, the only furniture the cell contained, and, to ease the aching of her head, let down her rich, abundant hair, drawing her fingers through its silky strands, for she had no comb.

"Oh, my poor hair!" she said; "must I lose you? The hair that my father admires so much—that my mother has so often smoothed and fondled—that Louis, my poor lost Louis, has kissed with rapture—that even the captain swore to defend with his good sword! Must you be shaved off? And oh! what an object I shall be with my bare poll! How Raoul and the girls would laugh to see me!" She laughed herself; for, with the versatility of her nation, she could enjoy a jest even at a crisis like the present.

Without undressing, she lay down, not to sleep, but to ponder her plan, and wait for her opportunity.

She heard the nuns in the next room getting ready for their repose, talking a little in whispers, or saying their prayers—then all was still. Not a sound was heard throughout the convent, for it was not one of those that keep night vigils.

Softly opening the door, she looked into the outer room. Ten nuns lay there, fast asleep, some of them giving audible proof of their condition.

Stepping as lightly as a cat, she crossed the room, and opening another door, found herself in a corridor, at the end of which was a window, looking out on the court below. This window was barred, but the bars were loose in their sockets, and could not resist the determined attack of this young, vigorous and desperate woman. Two of the bars removed, she forced herself out, and jumped from the window, reaching the ground without injury.

In the wall that surrounded the court was a postern gate, which, being merely bolted on the inside, she opened without difficulty, and found herself in the convent garden.

The garden was inclosed by a stone wall, which was not very high on the inside, but on the outside the ground descended abruptly to the bank of a small stream that flowed past the convent, rendering the descent difficult and highly dangerous.

A web of linen lay bleaching on the grass. Gabrielle caught it up, and tying one end of it around her waist, and the other to the limb of a tree that overhung the wall, let herself down easily and safely on the brink of the stream.

Following the course of the little stream, she soon reached the highway. According to what the coast guard had said, she was still a mile and a half from her destination, and without stop or rest she hurried on, in hopes to reach it before her flight was discovered.

At last, to her great joy, she saw the Three Windmills looming up against the starlit sky. Their sails were furled, and their clappers still, but their great arms, pointing upward, spoke hope and comfort to the weary, struggling girl.

Her only fear now was that the fisherman, impatient at her long delay, might have left his post and gone home.

Tommy wants to go swimming.

Let him go!

Give him a towel and a cake of Ivory Soap and let him go.

Thus will you achieve a double purpose—the boy will have his swim, which is good; and his bath which is better.

For the bath, there is nothing quite so good as Ivory Soap. It is pure, it lathers freely, rinses easily and leaves the skin as smooth as satin.

There is no "free" (uncombined) alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most delicate skin.

A PROFESSIONAL WOMAN

Experiments Made with Food

A professional woman in New York, connected with one of the large institutions there, has had a curious experience in using a certain kind of food. It seems she had a serious illness and was at the point of death, the brain and body in the last stages of exhaustion. She writes as follows:

"I have no objection to the public knowing of the wonderful transformation my system has undergone by the use of Grape-Nuts. I began using the food when convalescing and while in an exceedingly low condition. I used a small quantity and became so fascinated with the flavour that I gradually discontinued nearly all other food, including tea and coffee.

"I have gained 20 pounds in flesh, and am a marvel to all my friends who know of my former state of health. There are about fifty families who have adopted the use of Grape-Nuts because of my experience."

The makers of Grape-Nuts select certain parts of the grains of the field that contain delicate particles of phosphate of potash and albumen. These elements, when combined in the human body, go directly to rebuild the gray matter in the brain and nerve centres of the body.

This is a demonstrated fact and can be proven by any one who cares to make the test. When one nourishes and builds up the brain and nerve centres, that is practically the keynote to the whole health proposition, or when the nervous system is in perfect poise, all parts of the body respond. There's a reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Missions in South America*

NOT even a genuinely heathen field presents such great difficulties to the missionary as do the countries of Spanish America. Thanks to the enlightened policy of Gen. Diaz, the intolerance of the priests in Mexico has been curbed, and in South America there are indications of a more liberal attitude of the governments toward the preachers of the Gospel. If that attitude continues, there is hope, for where the Gospel is faithfully preached it must prevail. All that is demanded is a fair field and such legal protection as will keep the missionary out of prison and prevent his being openly assaulted and murdered. It cannot be that these privileges shall be long denied. Civilization is making its way and even the governments of South and Central America cannot afford to place themselves in antagonism to the religious freedom that obtains in other countries.

Already in Mexico, Guatemala and Chile the civil authority has nominally triumphed over priestly intolerance, and the missionary is permitted to work; but even there the social pressure put on the local authorities makes his life one of constant harass and danger. In Central America the Moravians, with characteristic faith and perseverance, have battled bravely on the Mosquito Coast and have won a signal triumph which may spread to other sections. In Peru, Brazil and Paraguay there are reports of progress, slow it is true, but full of promise. The aboriginal races are as yet practically untouched and the call for more workers is earnest and imperative.

The South American Evangelization Society is now thoroughly organized, and much is to be hoped from the consecrated workers it has sent into the field. With more funds and more encouragement, it might largely extend its work. But the hopelessness that seems to have fallen like a pall on the churches in reference to the South American field has crippled its powers. Strange that it should be so in view of its nearness to us and its appalling need. Much of the indifference is doubtless due to the persistence of one denomination of the Protestant church, which continues to insist that we have no right to send missionaries to a field already occupied by the Roman Catholic Church. But every visitor to that vast field tells us that Catholicism there is degraded and debased, and the need of the pure Gospel is urgent and extreme.

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for August 25. Ex. 20: 1-6.

Calumny*

HOW should a Christian bear himself under false charges? The question is often one of serious concern. The natural tendency is to rush to the defense of character, to deny, repudiate and give back scorn for scorn. There are times when vigorous self-defense is required. It would be injurious under some circumstances for the Christian to keep silence when he is falsely accused. Some would believe the false charge, and would regard his silence as a confession of guilt, and would cast reproach on his religion. But there are other circumstances in which a dignified silence is the best answer to a false charge. No man can afford to be continually chasing a calumny and bringing the slanderer to justice. He must let his character speak for him and wait for God to vindicate him.

When the reproach comes upon a man because of his religion, he may well bear it cheerfully. He has the blessing that Christ pronounced upon men so circumstanced: "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake." With such an assurance, no man need be cast down because of calumny. He has the support of knowing that God knows the truth, and while he has his approval he need not worry about what men say of him. Only he should be careful that he give no cause for reproach, and by abstaining from even the appearance of evil, give no ground on which his enemies can base a false charge.

Good men have always been targets for such assaults. Wesley used to say that he had been charged with every kind of meanness. Even the saintly Spurgeon was continually maligned, and even at the close of his life an American public teacher whom he had befriended came back here and uttered charges against him which he knew to be false. There are some men so envious and jealous that they glory in trying to pull down the reputation that a good man has, and to make charges against him that he is unable to disprove. In such a case there is no remedy but to be patient and to trust in God. Boerhaave used to say that calumnies were like sparks, which, if you do not blow upon them, will go out of themselves. But it is not always so; there have been some good men whose whole life has been saddened by such attacks.

NEW YORK had such a cold and long winter that a great many would-be weather-prophets said that there would be no real summer, and that it would be fashionable to wear overcoats the year round. The hot wave of the last few weeks dried up such predictions, as it did many other things. Day after day the sun poured down between the high and narrow buildings until the suffering people on the streets seemed to walk in a yellow haze. Toward night, when the sun had ceased its deadly work, the stone pavement and walls of brick, iron and concrete radiated heat until it seemed as if they were over some great furnace.

Night would come with the thermometer ranging in the upper part of the tube, and the people flocked to the parks and squares and to the freight piers that reach out on either side of New York into the North and East Rivers like long black arms.

Only on the water front did the exhausted thousands experience a sense of relief. Propped against posts and cleats, the tired mothers would doze, yet waking every now and then to see that all was well with the little group of children sleeping by her so close to the black water underneath. City Hall Park became a great bedroom for the men of the lower part of the city.

In Texas one district seems to have made a record for the year, though it cannot be learned that the people are particularly proud of the fact. The thermometer went up to 117 degrees in the shade, and refused to come down. Out in the sun it registered many degrees more. On the ranges the cattle dropped dead by the score, but wonderful to relate no deaths are reported among the people of the district, although many were affected with sunstroke.

Called Higher

On March 20, 1907, Mr. Joseph S. Dickinson passed away from Deep River, Conn. He is recorded as having derived great profit and instruction from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which he had read for many years.

James H. Porter departed this life on March 28, aged fifty-six years. Mr. Porter was a devoted Christian, and his death leaves a sense of loss in his home town of Groton, S. D. His widow rests upon the hope of a blessed reunion.

A follower of Christ for sixty-five years, Mrs. Phœbe Dunn, of Jonesboro, Ark., went to rest on February 28, 1906, in her eighty-third year. Mrs. Dunn was a life long student of the Scriptures and a constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Mr. Clement T. Paine, of Williamsport, Pa., passed away February 9, 1907, aged seventy-one years. He was one of the kindest of fathers, faithful and good to his family, of highest business integrity and most generous in his church relations. An earnest Christian, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, next to his Bible, was his greatest solace.

BABY HUNTER, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mrs. Hunter, wife of Dr. M. Hunter, 2808 N St., N. W., Washington, D. C., writes as follows:

Dear Sirs:

Our baby has been reared on Eskay's Food exclusively, and is now 16 months of age, is perfectly strong, never having had an hour's sickness since birth. She walked at ten months, and talks as well as most children twice her age. Doctor attributes it all to your incomparable food. We can not praise Eskay's enough, and Doctor orders it for all cases where nature fails to provide proper sustenance.

Again thanking you very kindly for Doctor and myself, I am most truly,

"LEAD THOU ME ON"

International Sunday School Lesson for August 25
*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

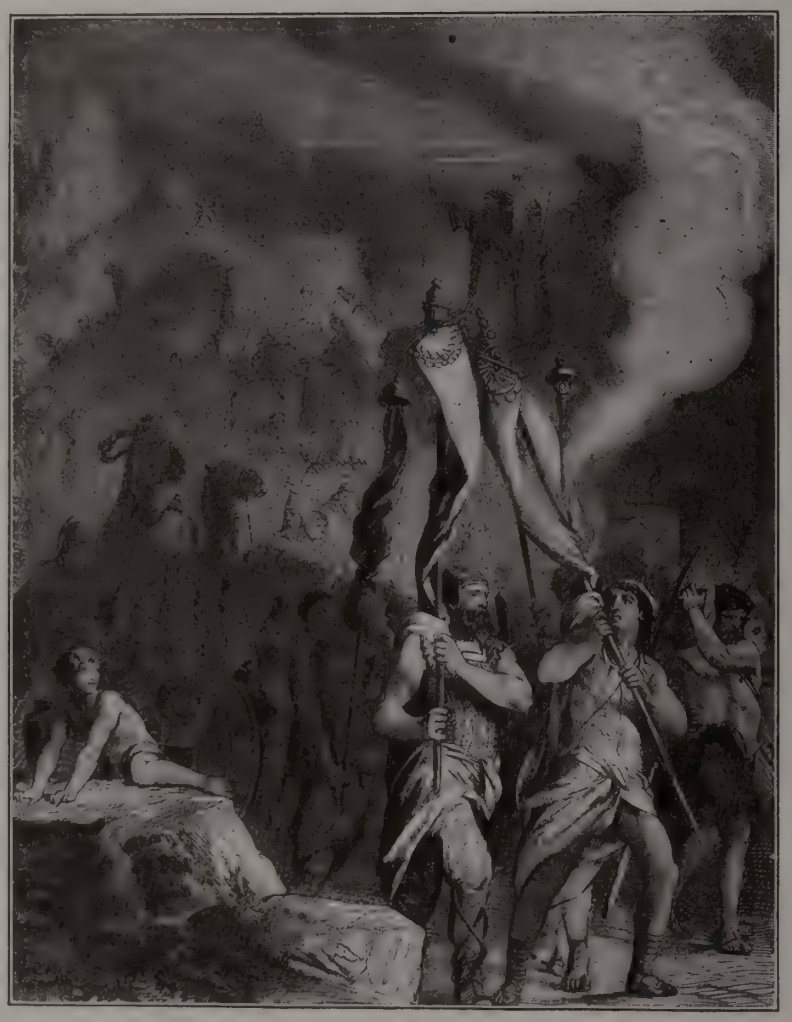
IT was at the crossing of the Red Sea that God first gave his shining brightness as a guide by which to lead his people. And by that sign he had led them on until they came to Sinai. And there the people remained for a year, because God's sign did not bid them go on. God had a purpose in keeping them there. It was that they might build the Tabernacle, and also that they themselves might be built up into a well-organized nation, for they were a motley throng when they left Egypt. But a year under God's tutelage had done wonders for them, and as a well-disciplined force they were ready to move forward to the Promised Land.

They have folded their tents, and God's water are, and where we can best find pasture for our flocks, and where the robbers have their dens." This second argument appealed to Hobab. He was more ready to help than he was to be helped himself. We are not quite sure Hobab consented to go. He probably returned to his people for a while, but at length cast in his lot with the Israelites (See Judges 1: 16; 4: 11; I. Sam. 15: 6).

God signaled, "Forward, march!" and the great host moved forward on a three days' journey. While Moses' strong desire had been to avail himself of the aid of Hobab, he did not lack faith in God, and his prayer was: "Rise up, O Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them



"Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee" tent as well. With standards raised and positions taken according to the command of Moses they are in line for marching. All faces are upturned awaiting the signal from God. It is lifted in air, as if God had made bare his arm. Only one man in the vast company holds back. It is Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses. Moses reasons with him, and tries to persuade him to go forward. Hobab urges that he is not a Hebrew, that he is only a visitor in the camp, and that he prefers to return to his own people, the Midianites. But Moses tells him of the great things God is going to do for Israel, and invites him to share it all: "Come then with us, and we will do thee good." Hobab is not convinced, and again proposes to return to his people. But Moses will not take "No" for an answer. He shows Hobab how his going may accomplish great good for Israel, because of his thorough acquaintance with the land through which they are to pass. Moses says to Hobab: "You know where the wells of that hate thee flee before thee." The people, too, had faith in God; they knew that he would feed them with manna daily, that he would bring water out of the rocks if necessary, that he would make bitter waters sweet, that he would provide meat for them by sending flocks of birds, and that he would even give durability to their garments.

The journey of life, and especially the Christian life, is often pictured by Israel's journey from Egypt to Canaan, especially the poets in such hymns as "Guide Me, Thou Great Jehovah," and "Lead, ndly Light." Here is an unfamiliar ng of the first stage of the journey:

They journeyed on through the wilderness
With the mountains on either side:
Behind them the foeman was pressing sore,
Before lay the turbulent tide.

Then they cried to the Lord in their stress and fear,
In that great and terrible day,
And lo, they were saved, and their foes o'erthrown,
For Jehovah opened the way.

Oh, many and many a time I, too,
As I traveled earth's deserts o'er,
Have entered a path that was mountain-walled
With the raging seas before.

But I cried to the Lord in my fear and stress,
In my dark and sorrowful day:
And he came himself to my soul's relief,
And lo, he opened the way.

MRS. E. B. THORNE.

"The cloud was taken up from over the bernacle." The cloud was "the white ume of Navarre" in the march of Israel. was the wilderness compass that ever inted out the way. Navigation was a ere coasting affair until the discovery of ie polarity of the magnet, which occurred little before the art of printing. This scovery was as simple as it was providenal. Some curious persons were amusg themselves by making a loadstone spended on a piece of cork swim in basin of water. They noticed that the adstone, when left at liberty, always rned toward the north. This fact was a ery simple thing, but it soon changed the hole world. Without the mariner's comass the work of the missionary would be onfined within the narrow limits of a oasting voyage, or a toilsome journey ver land.

God has given us a compass in conience, and a chart in the Bible for all he journey of life by land and sea. At ight the cloud pillar shone like fire, reminding us of the Psalmist's words, "The light also is thine," which is epitomized in he greeting "Good night," which means God's night. Let us not forget that affliction is God's night in which he leads us by the fiery pillar to God's morning.

A Baron's Resources

"They took their journey according to he commandment of the Lord." By this ime they knew that "all God's biddings re enablings." There seemed to be no dequate supply of food or water, but they remembered the manna and the smitten ock. There is a story of an old Scotch aron, who, shut up in his castle, withstood long siege that should have starved him ut. At last the enemy was surprised to see great string of newly caught fish hung ver the castle wall. That was a token that he castle would not be taken by siege while there were fish in the ocean, for it had subterranean connection with the sea. Equally safe are those who have connection with God's providence and grace.

Let us recall again this important fact that they "took their journey according to the commandment of the Lord." Happy the man who journeys daily "according to the commandment of the Lord." Let us, on the threshold of each journey, however short, ask sincerely, can we enter "according to the commandment of the Lord" that bids us "lay aside every weight" as well as "the sin which doth so easily beset us, and run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus"?

But Israel's history shows that doubt is hardly less a hindrance to Christian progress than outbreaking sin. When a man would come into the port of New York, it is not necessary, in order to defeat his purpose, that the ice should be frozen across the bar, or that there should be a chain drawn across the channel, or that forts should blaze away and sink him. Only let the white mist fall down from the cool heaven, and stretch from shore to shore—that is all that is necessary to prevent his progress. So doubt, with its chilling fog, hinders our progress heavenward. And much of it is not involuntary, but "the wish is father to the thought." It is not intellectual unbelief so much as wilful disbelief.

Through parts of Egypt and Palestine, between which the Israelites journeyed so slowly, rapid trains now run, but this does not prove progress, for the people carried swiftly are mostly no less selfish and sinful than their slower predecessors. The railroads of the United States have been unusually deadly in the past few years, and nearly every accident means grievous sin in the management somewhere. Danger signals are therefore important, and much interest is shown in a new automatic danger signal invented by Thomas E. R. Phillips, of Liverpool, that by trippers on the track electrically connected with the signal on the one hand, and semaphores in the engine cab bring the train to a stop even when the engineer does not see the signal or hear the duplicate warning. Hardly less numerous are the warnings God gives us when we are in moral danger, by the effect of sin on the health and reputation, by warnings in the pulpit and in the laws of the land.

A Viceroy's Boast

"The cloud of the Lord was over them by day when they set forward from the camp." There is profound significance in the fact that the very garment of God as he led Israel was a cloud, for to-day men are led heavenward more by the clouds of affliction than by cloudless prosperity. A missionary in China recently told us of a viceroy in that country who had said to him: "I have tried to do justice; I have not sold myself nor squeezed my people. But I have had a great deal of trouble. I have lost money and members of my family. It has seemed to me strange that if there is a God I should suffer so when bad men prosper. But I have been reading your Bible, and especially the Psalms, and now I understand that all this suffering is for our good; it is discipline to make us better." That was clearly the case with Israel, to whom forty years of discipline was the preparatory school for Canaan.

The writer remembers a railroad ride in Italy in which dark tunnels alternated with glimpses of orange groves and fairest flowers. But the train was carrying us no less rapidly to our destination in the darkness than in the light. So sorrow, not less but even more than joy, speeds us Godward. It is as if a railroad should atone for its tunnels by running in the dark at a greater speed than in the light.

The Author of "Gabrielle" Stricken

Miss Isabella Macfarlane, the well-known writer, author of Gabrielle, the Flower of New Rochelle, was stricken with paralysis recently and her recovery is despaired of. She is in her eighty-fifth year.

NEW USE FOR BUTTER
Prevents Boiling Over

Coffee frequently produces billiousness and all of the accompanying distress, such as loss of appetite, dyspepsia, bowel troubles, etc. A lady from Ill., says: "I had used coffee many years, and though I took great care in making it, felt its ill effects very seriously. It made me biilious and robbed me of my appetite for breakfast.

"I always had trouble with dyspepsia while I used it. I was told by physicians that I had catarrh of the stomach, and came to believe there was no help for me. Two years ago I quit the use of coffee and began to use Postum Food Coffee. At first I missed the stimulant, although the taste of the food coffee was delicious.

"In a few days I forgot all about my coffee, in the satisfaction I derived from Postum, and soon found that my appetite returned, the billious condition and dyspepsia disappeared, so that now I am proud to say that at the age of seventy-five years I enjoy my food as well as when young and all my dyspeptic symptoms and stomach trouble have gone.

"These troubles had been with me for most of my life and it is really remarkable that I am now so perfectly well. To say that I am grateful does not express it. Once in a while I find a person who does not like Postum, but I always find it is because it has not been properly prepared. There is but one way to make good Postum, and that is to make it exactly according to directions, allowing it to boil full fifteen minutes, not after it is placed on the stove, but after the real boiling begins. Use a small piece of butter, about the size of a pea, to prevent boiling over." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

FIVE REASONS FOR SHREDDED WHEAT

HERE THEY ARE:

FIRST REASON: The whole wheat contains all the material needed for the building of the perfect human body, for repairing waste tissue and replenishing the vital forces expended in mental and physical labor.

SECOND REASON: In SHREDDED WHEAT these elements are held in natural purity and are made digestible by steam-cooking, shredding and baking.

THIRD REASON: Cooking the whole wheat breaks down the starch cells in the center of the grain, making them soluble and digestible.

FOURTH REASON: The crisp and delicate shreds compel mastication, and, being very porous, are quickly permeated by the digestive fluids and hence easily assimilated by the most delicate stomach.

FIFTH REASON: The little particles of the outer bran-coat, scattered along the shreds, stimulate peristalsis ("bowel exercise") in a natural way—without irritating the intestines—and hence keep the stomach sweet and clean and the bowels healthy and active.

There are other reasons why you should eat SHREDDED WHEAT and why you should "talk" SHREDDED WHEAT—but these will suffice for the man who uses his brains when he eats.

TRISCUIT is the same as the BISCUIT, except that it is compressed into a wafer and is used as a toast in place of white flour bread. Both the BISCUIT and TRISCUIT should be heated in oven to restore crispness and flavor. All Grocers sell them.

Questions and Answers

W. J. S., Chino, Cal. What language is spoken at the Peace Conference at the Hague, where so many people of different nationalities meet in one session?

The sessions are conducted in French, the language adopted throughout the greater part of Europe for diplomatic intercourse. Interpreters explain the speeches to the few delegates from Asia and other parts of the world who do not understand that tongue.

U. F., Orost, Calif. 1. Who are the poor in spirit (Matt. 5:3)? 2. Who are those who are called but not chosen (Matt. 20: 16)? 3. Is there any hope for the backslider?

1. The humble and childlike. Christ had an antipathy to those who were proud and arrogant. His most severe reproofs were of the Pharisees. Talking to his own disciples, he told them that he who would be greatest must be the minister, and he set a child in their midst as being the symbol of the heavenly spirit. The poor in spirit do not criticize; they receive the truth, repent and obey the Gospel. 2. They are those who will not accept the Gospel. God does not choose those who will not quit their sins, nor those who cling to the world, nor those who want to be saved in their own way instead of by faith in Christ. 3. The backslider, the man who has fallen from grace, who has committed grievous sin, has every reason for hope if he will repent and return. Christ taught that truth in the parable of the prodigal son, and all through the Bible there are promises of restoration, if he will only seek it.

Rev. Daniel Steele, Milton, Mass., sends this interesting letter:

In your issue of June 24, you copy the case of "A Beneficial Fall" which began the recovery of a paralyzed leg. A more wonderful instance is that of my grandfather, Ezra Brainerd, whose wife was a niece of David Brainerd, missionary to the Indians. He was deacon of the church in Haddam, Conn., of which the pastor was Rev. David D. Field, D.D., father of the distinguished Field family. When Deacon Brainerd was eighty-four, one of his legs was paralyzed. Walking on his crutches he came upon an icy place. His crutches slipped and he had a violent fall. The neighbors picked him up and carried him home saying: "We have put the deacon to bed his last time." But they were mistaken: the fall put life into his dead leg. He got up and walked two miles to church without crutch or staff, married his third wife and lived in good health with her ten years, dying in his ninety-fourth year in the house in which he was born.

B. C., Deerfield, Mass. When did the draft riots occur in New York City?

They began on July 13, 1862, and lasted four days. About 1,000 persons were killed and $2,000,000 worth of property destroyed.

M. S., Clay Centre, Kan. Would an east wind divide the waters of the Red Sea now, as in the time of Moses?

Not in the way described in Exodus. Travelers tell us that they have seen the waters so driven back by the wind that it would be easy to ford at the crossing. The miracle consisted in the waters becoming a wall on the right and left (see Ex. 14: 22), and remaining so until the Israelites passed over.

J. R. K., Annapolis, Md. Has any practical application yet been made of the possibilities of the airship?

Professor Alexander Graham Bell declares that "airships will soon be seen everywhere." As an aid to the development of the science of aerial warfare, the German Reichstag has granted an appropriation of $125,000 to the distinguished officer and inventor who built the largest airship yet operated, for use in the further development of aerial warships.

J. K., Cleveland, O. What is the meaning of the motto Ich Dien, carried by the Prince of Wales?

It means "I serve." The motto was under the plume of ostrich feathers found on the helmet of the king of Bohemia, who was slain at the battle of Crossy. The king was serving as a volunteer in the French army. The Black Prince, son of Edward III., who won the battle, adopted the motto and it has since been borne with the three feathers by the heirs to the Crown of England.

C. E. P., West Pittsfield, Mass. What is the present attitude of the Jews toward Jesus Christ?

There are differences among the Jews. Some regard Jesus as a great teacher, a reformer who was ahead of his time. Some regard him as a heretic who was executed for teaching sedition. Others believe that he never existed. Some of them still look for a Messiah to lead them back to the promised land. Others regard the desire to return as sentimental nonsense, and are content to remain anywhere where they are well and fairly treated. There has recently appeared an earnest appeal to them, signed by eminent rabbis, not to intermarry with Gentiles, and not to forget their ancient faith.

J. S., Huntington, Mass. Can you give me some information about Girton College?

It is an institution for the higher education of women, at Cambridge, England. It was founded in 1869 at Hitchen, but removed to its present location in 1873. Newnham College, in Cambridge, was opened in connection with Girton in 1875. The courses offered are the same as those for the male students at Cambridge University.

H. Y., Greenwich, N. Y. What is the meaning of the title, Doge of Venice?

It is equivalent to Duke of Venice. The title was first used by Anafesto Paululio, who ruled in 697 A.D. Some other cities used the title doge for their elected rule Genoa, for instance.

L. O., Ogdensburg, N. Y. Where is Tara, me tioned in Moore's poem in the lines:

The harp that once through Tara's halls
The soul of music shed?

It is a hill in Meath, Ireland, where t early kings of Ireland were crowned.

A. N., San Francisco, Calif. Who invented t art of dyeing cloth?

It is said to have been the invention the Tyrians. They used dyes as early 1500 B.C.

Reader, Chattanooga, Tenn. 1. Will there United States warships stationed at Hampt Roads during the remainder of the Jamestov Exposition, and if so, is the public allowed board? 2. Where can I get a booklet descri tive of the city of Washington?

1. Yes; at least one ship of each typ battleship, cruiser, harbor defense, mor tor, torpedo boat, etc. The ships are the for public inspection, and visitors are show over the vessels by members of the crew appointed for that purpose. 2. You c get a good guide-book of the city Washington from Ammon & Mackell, boo sellers, 81 Chambers Street, New Yo City.

D. A., St. Louis, Mo. What became of the tri of Stockbridge Indians who lived former in the Berkshire Hills in Massachusetts?

A small remnant of the tribe is now Wisconsin.

J. E. T., Statesville, N. C. 1. Please give so idea of what is comprised under the one ter Vatican. 2. What is the date of Lincol famous speech at Gettysburg?

1. The palace of the Vatican, situat on the right bank of the river Tiber in t city of Rome, is known as the official re dence of the Pope. Besides containi the living apartments and garden of t Pope, it has immense reception-halls, wi a series of chapels, libraries, picture ga leries and museums of sculpture, antiqu ties and inscriptions, many of which a unequaled. THE NEGLECTED BOOK

IT is always the picture that tells a complete story that strikes the eye and holds the attention. Consequently it needs but few words to accompany the picture of "The Neglected Book." In these days, when so many volumes are printed dealing with almost every conceivable subject, the "Book of books is often neglected until the dust gathers on its pages and it becomes shelf-worn." In time of trouble, however, how quickly all this is changed! The works of travel, of science and of fiction are brushed aside and are forgotten, while the reader again turns the pages of the one Book that is the same to-day as it was many years ago, and will be the same through the centuries to come. The original picture was painted by David Bruce Conklin.

Original gravures of it, sizes 20x16, price $1, may be obtained of David B. Conklin, 578 Jefferson Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Mr. Alexander Visiting the Lepers who are Cared For at the Pakhoi Mission Station

A SOUL-WINNING WORLD TOUR

By GEORGE T. B. DAVIS

CHARLES M. ALEXANDER, the well-known Gospel singer who has come to America to attend the Northfield Conference, has made a tour of the world since he co-operated with Dr. Torrey in revival meetings a year ago. Although the journey was made primarily for the benefit of his wife's health, Mr. Alexander did not lose sight of the fact that his business was soul-winning.

Alexander in the Ship's Rigging

"The doctors advised months upon the sea as the only way to secure my wife's complete recovery," said Mr. Alexander to the writer. "Our minds at once turned to China. The year before, my wife's sister and her husband, Dr. and Mrs. Bradley, had gone as medical missionaries to Pakhoi, South China, and my wife's mother, Mrs. Cadbury, and her ungest daughter had already gone to them for a long sit. So we decided to spend some time with them uring our journey ound the world.

"We left London No- mber 23. We stopped r a few hours at Port id and Colombo, and sited missions at both laces. We had many pportunities on this oyage of continuing ur work of leading souls Christ by personal nversation with many eople.

"We changed to the teamship Delta at Co- mbo, and on our way to long Kong in the China ea, we had our Christ- as. It was most touch- g to see how each one ied with the other in aking fellow passen- ers enjoy the Yuletide.

"We spent nearly two months in Pakhoi, and returning to Hong Kong took the Japanese steamship Nikko-Maru to Australia, touching at Manila on the way. We visited Sydney, Bendigo, Melbourne, Geelong and Ballarat, and had a delightful time amongst the friends of five years before, when Dr. Torrey and I held missions in Australia. We left Sydney on the steamship Manuka for Vancouver. Then we crossed America to New York, to get the home steamer Oceanic, and reached Southampton on June 13, about seven months after we left England. Our home-coming was a sorrowful one, although the object of our journey was fulfilled in my wife's restoration to health.

"I was about two months in China, and was among the missionaries constantly, although I did not visit very many mission stations. The happiest and best contented people I have ever met have been missionaries. Difficulties which we here would call great, they pass by with a smile. In our brother-in-law's home in Pakhoi, we saw this illustrated constantly in the life of my sister-in-law. Amongst the multitude of perplexing questions and trials that crop up continually in a large household, and the hospitals, schools and leper compound, she had such a deep peace and unruffled quiet in her demeanor, that we all marveled. Seventeen miles away in Leim Chau, where the newspapers have been referring lately to the troubles in China, there were three missionaries right in the heart of the Chinese population. They were surrounded daily by grave dangers, yet they had such joy and peace and sweetness as I have rarely seen equaled. Even now it makes me feel good to think of the smile of one of the men as he talked."

"Did you do any mission work in China?"

"We had not planned to do any work before we left, but had asked all our friends to pray especially for one thing, that we might be good witnesses for the Lord Jesus Christ wherever we were, whether on land or sea. The numerous times that work was thrown in our way proved to us that God was answering prayer. We found many opportunities of encouraging missionaries and workers on board ship and in their homes. I never knew before what a place there would be for one on a foreign field to work for Christ, even though one could not speak the language."

"Did you hold any large meetings during your stay in Australia, and did you see any results of your previous work in 1902?"

"There was no prearranged plan before we reached Australia. We only named it 'a friendly call.' We wanted to go back to each place where Dr. Torrey and I had been before. We were unable to go to Tasmania and New Zealand, but managed to get to the larger places in Australia. At each place the largest building that could be secured was crowded, and it was a great joy to see the work standing firm that had been done five years ago. One gentleman, who is prominent in the affairs of his church, told me that twenty-five young men in his denomination had offered themselves for the ministry during the past year, and nearly every one of them attributed his conversion to our work there.

"After a meeting one night I was introduced to a gentleman who said that he was not in sympathy with

Rev. James I. Vance, D.D.*

Christ's Paradox

TEXTS { "Ye cannot serve God and mammon" —Luke 16: 13
"Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness" —Luke 16: 9

WITH these two apparently contradictory statements from Christ's own lips, made to the same audience and at the same time, for a text, I want to speak to you this morning about God and mammon, or God and riches, for "riches" is the English equivalent of the Chaldean word "mammon." Two ways of discussing the subject suggest themselves:

One is to deal in generalities; to speak in a broad and liberal and expansive manner; to run the subject up to such altitudes and out to such longitudes and latitudes that the universe may rest comfortably within the embrace of what is said; to show that the five points of Calvinism are logically implied, and the doctrine, polity and practice of Christendom involved in the right relations of God and mammon. Were I to attempt and succeed in a discussion of this kind you would probably depart saying: "We have listened to a very able and profound and philosophical and exhaustive treatment of the subject."

The Bible on Riches

The other is to be particular and personal; to probe down to the spot that is tender and sensitive; to discuss not so much the theological and commercial as the experimental aspects of the subject; to reduce all lines of altitude and latitude and longitude to the measurements of the individual; and to remark, in the language of Nathan to David: "Thou art the man." Were I to follow this plan, I am afraid you would go away saying: "Money, money, money! All these preachers are after is money." Hence I am in "a strait betwixt two." I do not want to throw away an opportunity, for that is what it amounts to when the people put the sermon into cold storage with the remark: "It was an able effort." Neither do I want you to think that the church is after your money, for it is not, unless you come along with it. Badly as the church needs money, we need to give far more than the church needs to get.

Perhaps the best plan will be to try to set before you some of the teachings of the Bible on this subject, especially what is contained in these two apparently contradictory statements of Christ, and let the result be what it may. The Bible has much to say on the money question. No careful reader of either the Old or New Testament can escape this. In the New Testament, more attention is given to it than, perhaps, to any other phase of Christian duty. It is true there are people who seem to think that religion is something apart from the money question. They regard it as a little holy of holies, where the soul is alone with its God and where so secular a thought as money should not be allowed to enter. Christ did not think so. If he did, why did he say to the rich young man, "Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me"?

If he did, why did he utter the parable of the rich fool, who to accommodate his increasing crops tore down his barns and built bigger, and said: "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thine ease, eat, drink and be merry"? But God said unto him: "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

Importance of the Question

If Christ held that money has nothing to do with religion, why did he speak of Lazarus and Dives, and of the widow and her mites? Why did he say, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of heaven!" Why did he say, "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal; but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal." Why did Paul write to Timothy: "The love of money is the root of all evil; which while some coveted after, they have erred from faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows"? No, religion is not something apart from the money question. It is intimately associated with it; and in the text the two are brought together in such a way as to arrest attention.

First, Christ bids them suspect each other; then he bids them be friends. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness."

Christ names, in one breath, the two great forces of the world: God and mammon, religion and wealth. On the one hand is God and his worship. It is the side of life represented by faith. It is where the soul operates. It is that which instructs conscience and shapes character and determines destiny. It is the influence of the infinite and invisible on human life. Its atmosphere is prayer. It is that which gives us the Bible, the Church, the Sabbath, the promises, and our immortal hope. It stands pre-eminently for the life that is to come. It values this life, but only as a school or training ground for the next. Man is an immortal creature, and this life is lived aright only as it has an eternal outlook.

There can be no doubt about God being a real force in the world. Religion is not a myth. Man is built for a religious career. He has powers that can be employed, and aspirations that can be satisfied only in that way. He does things because he believes things. Back of his battles is his faith.

Your God! What treasures rise at the mention of his name! "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath thee are the everlasting arms." "Fear thou not; for I am with thee; be not dismayed; for I am thy God; I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness." One whom we all know and love, recently, greatly troubled by the physician's announcement of the possible loss of sight, was feeling around for something to sustain and comfort, when this blessed promise shone out on the sky of faith: "He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness." God is precious, and his love is our treasure.

Mammon and Worship

On the other hand is mammon and its worship. It is the side of life represented by the senses. It is where the soul serves the body. It likewise instructs conscience and shapes character and determines destiny. It is the influence of money on human life. Its atmosphere is commercialism. It is the force represented by trade, by all money-making, wealth-producing, wealth-acquiring agencies. It stands pre-eminently for the life that now is. It may believe in a future life, but there is no bank there in which to deposit mammon's gains. Money is not an eternal asset. A dead man carries no letter of credit. He leaves all his property behind.

There can be no sort of doubt about money being a real force in the world. It is not a myth either. People are after it. What is it that the average mortal will not do for enough of it? He will sacrifice well-nigh everything. It colors his convictions. If the profit is large, he sees a great light. If there is money in it, the thing is hard to resist. Man is built for a money-seeking career. He has powers that can be employed and aspirations that can be satisfied only in that way; and the advice given to many a young man is: "My son, with all thy getting, get to thyself a good bank account."

Your mammon! Your wealth, your property, your wages, your salary, your riches or your desire for riches, your longing to get on! How much of life is represented by this, whether your property, like that of Zaccheus, makes men call you rich; or like that of Simon Peter, consists of a leaky boat and some worn-out nets. These are the two forces, God and mammon, religion and money. They are world-forces. They control well-nigh everything. Back of nine-tenths of what people do are either their religious convictions or their financial interests. These two forces are separated by great lines of cleavage. They are world-leaders and nearly everything that goes gets in behind one or the other.

Christ says that these two forces should be suspicious of each other. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." He seems to say that religion and wealth are irreconcilable. He certainly says, "One who worships God cannot worship mammon; and one who worships mammon cannot worship God."

Double Worship Impossible

The reason is evident. What one worships is supreme with him. In the nature of the case there cannot be two supremes; for that instant both cease to be supreme. There is not room in the soul of man for the worship of more than one god at a time. "No servant can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other." "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve." who worships mammon has given up the worshi God. Therefore Christ says it must be one or other; either God or mammon.

And yet some try to do the impossible. They tr worship a double-headed, double-faced deity. T hold on to the forms of God's worship in the ch on Sundays; and then they go out and practise m mon-worship during the week. They say their pra to the money-god and seek his favor. They not let their business interfere with their religion Sunday; no more will they let their religion inter with their business on Monday. They do not wan be infidels; neither do they want to be poor. They not want to go to hell, but they would like to comfortable on earth.

Risk of Postponement

Sometimes we realize the futility of this effort two-faced worship, and decide to take one god a time. A man says: "I will not give up religion, merely postpone it. I will devote myself to mak money for a few years, and not allow religion to int fere; for religion and modern business methods do always comfortably consort. Then, when I h squeezed the lemon of mammon and gotten all money I want, I will return unto the Lord and spe the last years of my life as a good Christian."

Such a man takes a tremendous risk. How does know he will live to finish the process? "What is y life? It is even a vapor which appeareth for a lit while and then vanisheth away." And suppose he d live to finish this programme of mammon, how d he know he will come out the same man that went i We grow like that we worship. He who worshi mammon for the best years of his life will disco that the desire for God's worship is dead and the s itself has atrophied. Christ says the thing cannot done. It must be one or the other, God or mammo which shall it be? We know that he is warning against the worship of wealth.

Mammon-worship is degrading and debasing. Tak on its own terms, the man who sells himself for mon makes a poor investment. He who sacrifices hon reputation, conscience and love for mere dollars is fool. Suppose one does get one hundred thousand d lars for swearing to a lie, he is a loser. He has lost h self-respect, and self-respect is worth more than o hundred thousand dollars. Money is no compensatio for the loss of either character or reputation. Mon cannot buy them. It cannot even buy length of lif A famous millionaire is reported to have offered te million dollars to any man who would add ten yea to his lifetime. But money cannot move back th hands on the dial-plate of time. It cannot retard fo a second one grain in the hour-glass of destiny. Wha a wretched travesty of a god is this mammon, which i powerless to add a day to the brief span of our morta existence, compared with the mighty God who says, " give unto them eternal life and they shall neve perish!"

Money is not only powerless to buy life; but the lov of it debases character. "The darkest day," said Hor ace Greeley, "in any man's earthly career is tha wherein he first fancies that there is some easier wa of gaining a dollar than by squarely earning it." Th worship of wealth kills the best there is in human nature. It makes us hard and narrow and mean and sordid. It is amazing what contemptible things one can be guilty of when money is involved.

A Money-loving Deacon

Recently in conversation with a well-known missionary, I related this incident which had come under my own observation in a country church in the South: The collection had been gathered to pay the presbyterial assessment, which amounted to ten cents per member. The deacons retired to a little room in the rear to count the collection and discovered that it amounted to more than the assessment. Whereupon one of the deacons said: "Brethren, we have raised more than the amount, and just now I am at unusual expense in putting a new roof on my barn. I will take back my dime." And he did. No doubt he thought he had a soul and was looking forward to the bliss of heaven beyond the grave, but it is difficult to understand how a soul so small can make much of heaven.

My missionary friend, on hearing the story, said: "That proves that we are once more one people and a Fortunately Sir Alexander Simpson of Edinburgh, a friend of ours, was a fellow passenger on the steamer, and did everything that the best medical skill could devise. From him I learned how she had visited those who were unable to leave their cabins, and had talked personally with many about their souls' welfare, in such a gentle, sweet manner that her passing away was deeply felt all through the ship."

"It is probable that I will work again in conjunction with Dr. Torrey. Australia, America and England have invited us, but we have not decided which call to accept.

"I can think of no more appropriate message to send to our American friends than these beautiful words in Isaiah 43: 2: 'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.' Before my wife's illness, she wrote these words in the autograph album of an old Sunday School scholar, and called my attention to it two days before she was taken suddenly worse. Her mother had the words printed and framed, and hung at her bedside where she could see them all the time. Wherever we have gone, she has told about her experience with that verse, and few people have ever seen the depth of meaning until their attention was called to the word 'through.' Money a Revealer

It is what people reveal themselves to be when ney is involved, that they are. It is a revealer of cracter, and because the love of money debases, rist said of the farmer with his big barns and growig crops: "Thou fool." Yet many are playing the
l. The worship of mammon is common and popu-
l. It has invaded the very temple of God. It is the se of our age and land. Even our opinions are esti-ted on a commercial basis.

A remarkable and significant editorial on this genl subject appeared in a recent number of The Wall eet Journal. Had it been published in some reli-us periodical, it might have been taken as a matter of rse; but the fact that it is the editorial utterance of t paper representing the money street of the nation, ests attention.

The editor says: "What America needs more than lway extension, and Western irrigation, and a low iff, and a bigger wheat crop, and a merchant marine, l a new navy, is a revival of piety. That's what we d now to clean this country of the filth of graft, and greed, petty and big; or worship of fine houses and lands and high office and grand social functions.
hat is this thing we are worshiping but a vain repeti-n of what decayed nations fell down and worshiped t before their light went out? Read the history of me in decay and you will find luxury there that uld lay a big dollar over our little doughnut that ks so large to us. Great wealth never made a nation bstantial nor honorable. There is nothing on earth t looks good that is so dangerous for a man or a tion to handle as quick, easy, big money."

"Ye cannot serve God and mammon." It must be e or the other—which? Do not imagine that the oice is to be made only by the rich. It is to be made ually by the poor. There are men without a dollar o worship money; and there are men of large means o look further and seek first the kingdom of God d his righteousness and enjoy the fulfilment of the omise. It is not a question of how much one shall rship, but of what. Christ says it cannot be God and mmon.

Having said this he seems to contradict himself. He tells religion and wealth to be friends. "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness." What a paradox! Someone has described a paradox as a truth standing on its head. The truth certainly seems to be upside down in this second part of the text. What does it mean?

The Steward's Plan

Christ has just uttered the parable of the unjust steward who was about to lose his position, and who, by a shrewd but dishonest use of his lord's money, made friends of his lord's creditors; so that when he lost his place, these creditors received him into their habitations. Turning to his disciples, Christ says, "Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations."

How are we to interpret this strange and apparently contradictory statement? Christ certainly does not mean to endorse the steward's dishonesty, for that would be for him to deny himself. Neither does he mean to say that everlasting habitations are purchasable with money, that salvation may be bought with mammon; for this would be to discredit all his other teachings.

He evidently meant to commend in his disciples precisely the thing that the lord commended in his steward; and that was such a use of money or mammon as to make one's condition comfortable when the money or mammon has passed from his control. That is, Christ says to his disciples: Make to yourselves friends, by the use of the mammon of unrighteousness or by the use of money, that when ye fail, these friends you have thus made may receive you into everlasting habitations. In other words, use money in this life so as to make your condition comfortable in that life where money has passed from your control. It is the making of eternal friends by the right use of money or wealth, that Christ commends. He teaches therefore that mammon may be employed in such a way as not only not to conflict with the worship of God, but actually to contribute toward it. How?

Mammon to Worship God

By making mammon worship God. Money is not an evil in itself. It is a blessing, and may become one of the most powerful agencies for good, provided it takes the right place. That place is not on the throne beside God but on its knees before him. The instant that wealth recognizes that it is a servant, not to be worshiped but used, and used not for itself but for the glory of God, we should cease to suspect it and come to regard it as a friendly power.

That is as someone says: "While we cannot worship God and mammon, we can and should worship God with mammon." When mammon worships God, Christ bids us make it our friend. The effect of using money to do good, to further Christ's work in the world, is just the opposite of the hoarding process. It stimulates and develops all that is noblest in character. It broadens and liberalizes and enriches the nature.

Money thus used is not only a friend; it makes friends. It has been well said that "money is power in storage." It enables us to transfer ourselves into other places and things. It makes it possible for one to double, treble, quadruple his personality. One may not be able to work in person among the needy of the earth; but he may be able to support a nurse, a missionary, a physician, a Bible woman, and in this way to minister as truly as if he were there in person. Christ says that when at last we come to leave this earthly tabernacle and enter the house not made with hands, these friends we have thus made, the good we have done by the right use of money, will receive us into everlasting habitations, and heaven will be brighter and happier because of their welcome.

The conversion of mammon is one of the great revivals that is needed. The revolution that is needed to overthrow the worship of mammon will come about in no other way. It will come, not by the arbitrary and universal distribution of wealth, but by its voluntary and complete consecration. It is the Christianization of money that is needed.

The Right Use of Money

It is needed pre-eminently for the sake of Christ's kingdom, and its absence seems to be the one thing that prevents the speedy evangelization of the world. Every country is open to the gospel, and a great army of volunteers have offered themselves for service in the foreign field. On the surface it looks as if the missionary problem were resolving itself into the question of how to finance the kingdom.

The individual Christian needs it for his own sake. One has not made much progress in the Christian life if he fails to recognize the lordship of Christ over his income.

We weary of the many calls for money, and it is not strange. Many of them lack merit, and, besides, one cannot help all. But it is a blessed privilege to help. It is a glorious thing to be able to give.

A woman recently died in New York City at the age of eighty-five years, whom we should most likely pronounce as fanatical, at any rate as lacking in sound judgment. Her husband, a well-known physician, died twenty years ago, leaving her a fortune. During his lifetime, they were most generous in their gifts to charities; and after his death, she continued this philanthropic work. One day she awoke to the discovery that her property was all gone, and she must support herself. This she did by renting an apartment and subletting it. There she died, having at her death only $1.50 in money and being buried by friends she had made after her reverse of fortune.

It is likely that we should be disposed to condemn her as improvident; but what is His verdict who watched the people as they cast gifts into the treasury, and who said of the widow that cast in two mites, all her living: "She hath cast more in than all they that have cast into the treasury."

Lord, teach us not only to pray, but teach us to give. Teach us that while we cannot serve God and mammon, we can and should serve God with mammon; and show us how to make friends of the mammon of unrighteousness so that when we fail, they may receive us into everlasting habitations! Amen.

A FESTIVAL OF THE UTES

Two Little Ute Girls

Captain Ridley and Members of the Ute Tribe

A Ute Squaw and her Escort

OUT among the lofty peaks of the Rocky Mountains, in picturesque Utah, dwell a solemn-faced, quiet tribe of copper-colored men. Probably their composure and dignified demeanor have been heightened by having lived so long among the silent mountains of the West. The Indian agency at White Rocks is over sixty miles from a railroad station, beautifully located in a rich tract of land.

There, in the springtime, the Ute Indians gather annually to celebrate the advent of warmer days and the breaking up of the hibernation of the mountain bears.

The ceremonial dance continues one week, and throughout the last night, ending with a feast which is heartily welcomed by the squaws and braves. This is a gala time with our uncivilized brothers, who are befittingly dressed for the occasion in bright colored clothes, gay feathers, beads and jewelry. On their faces are dashes of paint, with red and yellow streaks around the eyes and on the cheeks.

It is primarily a mating dance, a male applicant for matrimony making his desires known to the world by wearing white cloth wrapped about his body. This is not removed until some fair one has accepted his heart, hand and tepee.

The bear dance is seldom held on a spot previously used for the same purpose, as it is supposed to be afterward used by the spirits of the departed. The space, of about one acre, is enclosed by a circular wall ten or fifteen feet high. This is made of long, slender branches woven back and forth between upright posts. On the ground, just inside, sit the dancers; the squaws on one side of the circle, the bucks on the other.

The music for this festal occasion is far from melodious and produces a decidedly weird effect.

The musical instrument consists of an inverted box about twelve feet long by three feet wide and two feet high; the bottom having been removed, and replaced by a covering of zinc or tin.

Around this are seated the musicians, each holding in an upright position on the metal covering a stick two feet long, in the sides of which are cut deep notches. Over the notches is rubbed a dried bone. A rasping noise is produced, and to this accompaniment the performers hum low, long-drawn notes. When the music begins, every member of the weaker sex, be she old or young, a woman of fifty or a child of six, chooses her partner by a simple beckoning motion which seems to be quite unobserved by the chosen one. When the right moment comes, the bucks form in a line facing a line of squaw partners opposite. Each line falls into step, one retreating, the other advancing. The movement consists of three steps backward, then two forward. Though by no means difficult, it is an easy, graceful movement, with a decided swing. Inexperienced adult dancers as well as small ones are prompted by the "floor manager," who walks behind the moving l carrying a stick, with which he touches up the lagga

One must see the enclosure with the multi-colo costumes; the squaws with their happy faces expres genuine pleasure; the bucks with immobile cou nances, and the little children vainly trying to k step, to fully appreciate the Ute Indian in his nat surroundings, enjoying life after his own fashion.

The squaws are of low stature, heavily built, w fine, regular features, and long, jet black hair, wh enhances the copper-colored tints of the skin.

Among the men are many splendid specimens manhood, with such athletic physiques as that of C tain Bob Ridley, chief of the Indian police. The nat police have taken the place of the United States tro in maintaining order in the Ute country.

The Utes are very superstitious regarding the feel minded. Two miles from the agency there is a cr Indian, who, both summer and winter, has lived wi out covering or fire for over twenty-six years i tepee composed only of poles. Incredible as it n seem, his hair has often been chopped from the i and several times his family have tried in vain to l him on the mountains, but his animal instinct led h back to his lair before his relatives returned.

LUCIE B. DAVIS.

A SUCCESSFUL ORIENTAL TEACHER

GOOD and useful work has been done in Ceylon by a self-sacrificing Christian teacher whose name is familiar to readers of this journal. Some twelve years ago, the editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, impressed with the intelligence and ability of a young student of Princeton Univers ty, had the pleasure of introducing him to the Christian public of the United States and Canada. Mr. Rutnam, a Hindoo by race and a native of Ceylon, the large island lying off the southern coast of India, appeared to us a young man singularly adapted to extend the religion of Christ not only in his own land but in southern India. His career in the university of Madras and later at Princeton, confirmed our confidence. Invitations to preach and lecture reached him from all quarters and were filled, so far as his studies at the university permitted, with great gratification to large audiences. Thousands of Christian people in our great cities learned more of the social life and conditions in India and Ceylon from his lectures than they knew before, and all were deeply impressed by the eloquence and simplicity with which he presented the truths of the Gospel in his sermons. Mr. Rutnam contended that only an Oriental could understand and appreciate many of the allusions of our Lord and much of the teaching of the ancient prophets, and he was able to shed light, from his own experience, on some passages which became full of meaning as he described Oriental customs that he had witnessed.

Mr. S. C. K. Rutnam and the Professors in the Ceylon Central College

It is with much pleasure that he is welcomed now to this country after ten years' absence. He might easily have obtained lucrative employment in our colleges as professor of Oriental languages or of Eastern philosophy at the conclusion of his Princeton course; but his conception of his duty was that he should devote himself to the elevation of his own people. He knew that he could preach the Gospel his own race more convincingly than the ablest white missionary could do, and, bei familiar with Oriental literature and traditions, could argue with the Hindoo wi more effect. Besides which, he would not appear among them as a foreign teache who is always regarded with prejudice by the more cultured classes, who are t leaders of Indian thought. He kne that the struggle would be hard, for h had not the support of any missiona society and would have to rely on suc help as the natives would give. He w quite right; the struggle has been har but he has triumphed, and he has con back to report the organization of prosperous college which has becom self-supporting. It began simply as Christian school for boys, but the native found that there was no institution i Ceylon in which so thorough and prac tical an education was given, and thoug Christianity was inculcated there, the submitted to that drawback for the sak of the excellence of the secular teaching. The school prospered and it evolved int a college in which there are now nearl two hundred students, forty of whom ar boarders. There is a faculty of twelv professors, all of whom are capable and earnest men. During his recent tour i India and the East, Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, president of Union Theological Seminary in New York, made a thorough inspection of the college, which Mr. Rutnam has named the Central College, and was delighted with the work being done. He wrote: "The spirit of its principal and the lofty tone of instruction conveyed in the classes, convinced me that with God's continued blessing this college has a great future in store for it. God grant that it may be even more successful in the

IN THE "CHILDREN'S TEMPLE"

A SUNDAY AFTERNOON SERVICE AT MONT-LAWN

"I BELIEVE, believe on the Lord Jesus Christ"—the rich, mellow tones of the organ in the Children's Temple at Mont-Lawn peal forth, and the melodious strains are echoed by hundreds of ringing voices, heartily singing the grand old Scriptural injunction. "For God so loved the world" rises sweetly in softer measure, and so on through the exercise, which closes like a benediction with the promise:

My peace I leave with you,
My peace I give to you.

Then the little heads, marked already by so many characteristics which time will develop for good or ill, bow in reverent prayer. To many of the youthful pilgrims on life's journey the Children's Home has become their Mecca, and they are familiar with the swinging hymns which are printed upon the leaflet—familiar with the voice of prayer, and the simply and forcibly illustrated exposition of the Word. Many, too, are members of mission Sunday Schools; to these it has become a habit to assume the attitude of worship. But there are truly the "children of all nations" gathered here, and there are those by whom the bright Temple service is looked upon with round-eyed wonder as a mysterious rite. To all, however, it grows precious with association, and the seed which is sown so wisely and lovingly during the quiet Sabbath afternoon hour in Mont-Lawn's Temple, bears out the parable of old—though some fall by the wayside and among thorns and stony places, yet other fall into a good and fertile soil, which shall bring forth a glorious harvest in time to come.

Here is the house-mother, ready with her lesson for the day.

"Children, when you're on your way to school and see a square sign fastened on the front of a house, do you know what it means?"

Half a dozen hands fly into the air and half a dozen voices pipe out, "Measles." "Yes, and there are other illnesses, each of which has its distinguishing mark, but of them all the very worst one, and the one which cannot be cured, is —what?"

One doubtful murmur from a bright-eyed Scotch lassie —"Lepers."

"Yes, but dreadful as it is, it leaves no deeper marks upon little faces than wicked thoughts and hateful words leave upon little hearts. And just as in olden time, the leper cried, 'Lord, if thou wilt thou canst make me clean,' so there is One now—this hour—who can cure us if we ask him. You know, if you use a telephone, there has to be somebody at the other end, or else there's no use in talking, and the dear Saviour is always waiting at the other end of the telephone. If a desire comes to you to take what is not your own, if you are angry with each other, run quickly to your heart's telephone, and be sure that He to whom you pray, 'Make me clean,' will quickly, gladly answer, 'I will. Be thou clean.'"

Many a serious face bears witness that the story lesson had not failed to make its point, and when Dr. Klopsch rises, scores of youthful hearts are ready for his message—a message unique in its application to the barren lives of his young auditors.

A Host of Little Auditors in the "Children's Temple"

"Once upon a time," he begins in the good old way, "there was in the far-off city of Florence a rare and beautiful statue. Of spotless, snowy marble, the fair and delicate beauty of the figure was so graceful in its outline, so full of harmony in its pose, that every eye which beheld it acknowledged its perfection. There came a day when the people of Florence were allowed to enter the great gallery of art in which this gem of sculpture stood.

"Among the great throng who poured through the open doors and paused before the wonderful expression of a master's art, there was one small Florentine girl, dirty and tattered and poor, oh, so poor! with a big, beautiful soul that responded eagerly to the beauty which surrounded her. She stood motionless before the statue, gazing with rapt eyes at its every detail of grace and purity. Then the little one stole away, turning with dragging feet to her own squalid home. But she took the memory of the marble with her in all its immaculate spotlessness, and her first act was to cleanse her own soiled hands and face, that they might bear some resemblance to the stately white figure of the Florentine statue.

"Day by day the little child of poverty crept back to feast her beauty-loving heart upon the masterpiece. Day by day, as she returned to her home, she sought to bring the lesson of the statue into her own poor life. The slender little body was pure and clean now, the rough boards were scoured, and even the indifferent mother, who regarded the change in her child with astonishment, was moved to effort by her little daughter's eager longing to bring into the humble home some reminder of the snowy image which had inspired within her hungry heart a great yearning for order and grace and spotless cleanliness.

"That, children, is what we want Mont Lawn to become to you. May this fair and beautiful domain, in all its shining cleanliness, be to your lives the Florentine statue from which you shall learn habits of neatness, repose of manner, and both moral and physical grace and charm.

"We want our teachers and caretakers to feel themselves each an integral part of the perfect whole, and so to carry their responsibility for the attention to detail required to keep our Children's Paradise up to its standard of a model Children's Home, that there shall never be a flaw upon our statue.

"When you go home, children, carry with you the memory of the pure, white statue, and, never forgetting that cleanliness and order are lessons well worth learning, remember always that only the hand of the divine Sculptor can make us all glorious within.'"

The shadows are falling and the hour is at an end. Almost like a pledge given in answer to earnest pleading, the children gently sing:

We will cheer the weary all the way along,
Fill their hearts with courage and inspiring song;
Comfort them and bless them, love and help bestow,
Shine the love of Jesus, wherever we go.

A JUVENILE EVANGELIST

THERE can be no question about the remarkable success which has attended the preaching of the twelve-year-old Frances Bradley Storr, of Doncaster, England. In one month she has addressed audiences comprising 5,000 persons, and it is said that something like 300 men and women have made profession of conversion as a result of her simple, childlike preaching. Not often is it given to a child of such tender years to become a spiritual teacher of the people, but such a remarkable occurrence is not without precedent.

The little girl is a daughter of parents of humble origin. Her mother is in the employ of the British Woman's Temperance Association as a police-court missionary at Doncaster, and has been a lay-preacher in her denomination for upwards of twenty years. To the astonishment of the graybeards of the Primitive Methodist Church, the simple, earnest appeals of her gifted child during the last ten months have caused a wave of revival to sweep through her home county, which has spread to neighboring counties. She is just a winsome girl of marked intellectuality. Her unusual thoughtfulness has, perhaps, made her a little older in appearance than her years would lead one to expect; but she is as bright, eager and sparkling as an ordinary child.

Perhaps the secret of the child's success is to be found in the mother's intense desire and constant prayer that one of her children should be permitted to help her in her religious work, and is another proof that God can use any instrument that he chooses. "Why did you attempt to preach?" she was asked. The large, expressive eyes lighted up with enthusiasm and the answer came with almost breathless eagerness. "Oh, I think it is the grandest sight on earth to see men and women converted. That is what I wanted to preach for—the message seems to be given to me, and I simply deliver it."

Even as the Great Teacher invariably drew his illustrations from the homely happenings of everyday life, so this earnest little disciple of his adds strength to the message she gives by drawing appropriate analogies from the experiences of her own childhood. From the helplessness of the little child and its instinctive call upon "father" or "mother" in trouble or danger, is drawn the lesson of dependence upon the Heavenly Father. A striking illustration of this method is an apt and pertinent inference drawn from an ordinary occurrence. Reminding her audience that the light of the Gospel is always shining through prosperity and adversity alike, even though the careless and indifferent do not seek the guidance of its far-reaching beams, she said: "When you go into a railway car you may not notice that there is a light in the car; but when you run into the darkness of a tunnel you see it and feel glad that it is there because the darkness has come."

So the child tells her story and the people understand her, and accept her as a messenger of God. She is generally accompanied by her mother, who is anxious that the small evangelist be not spoiled by unwise adulation. She has more engagements already than she can fill, and her power and pathos continue to move the multitudes.

A Husband's Tribute

AT the funeral service of his wife, who died lately, the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman paid a glowing tribute to her character and virtues. He said among other things.

Many a friend has given me credit for this and that; the laurel might more fittingly have been placed at her feet. She was like a shadow of a great rock in life's rugged way for me, and I never sought her help in vain. If the slander of men ever assailed me, she was the first to breathe into me the spirit of courage, and her loving smile was the antidote which effectually offset the virulent attacks of men. Men have said kind words concerning my ministry. I testify publicly to-day that I owe more for what I may have been permitted to do to the sweet influence of this angelic soul than to any one else this side of heaven. Her personality pervades many of my sermons, and she has animated the most of my illustration. She was the most consistent Christian I have ever known.

The Divine Hand

IS the dream of the poets coming true—that far-off vision of which has been the hope and the prayer of the optimists through all the ages? Not in any previous generation have we had a waking glimpse of it. It has been spoken of, if at all, in that grave and subdued tone in which men are wont to refer to some great transformation which all agreed to regard as practically impossible.

Yet any one who has watched the course of recent events at The Hague cannot help being struck with the conviction that the far-off event has come a little nearer. Our quarrelsome, selfish, semi-savage old world, with its jumble of war and politics, and its conflicting ambitions, is at last being slowly but surely illuminated by the great truth which has been the refrain of the song of sage and prophet. The folly and wickedness of war; the senselessness of national jealousies; the sin of human oppression; the narrowness of individual and corporate greed; the evil of unfair competition—all these and many other iniquitous things the world is gradually beginning to see in their true perspective.

Cynics may mock at the feeble first efforts made at The Hague for the establishment of a World's Peace Court. Statesmen may smile at it as chimerical. Ambitious rulers may deride it as the scheme of impractical visionaries. But the entering wedge has gone in, just as, less than half a century ago, the wedge was driven deep into the heart of the slavery system, which men had thought to be invulnerable.

It is a divine hand that directs the uplift of humanity. Step by step the race is becoming enlightened. Kings and cabinets, armies and navies cannot stop its progress. Every new invention, every advance in the social, industrial or commercial world, every new school that is opened, adds another count to the long indictment against war. All the races, yellow, brown, white and black, are coming into the light; and even those that were but lately regarded as little better than savages are yielding to the influences of education and the Gospel. Logically, enlightened humanity will regard war with abhorrence.

What has taken place at The Hague, then, is merely the beginning of things. The daybreak, which will witness the rising of the Sun of Peace, may still be very far off. But some day it will rise. Meanwhile, let all who love their fellow men hope for it, work for it, pray for it.

The Pope on Heresy

VERY interesting to theologians of all denominations is the latest utterance of Pope Pius X. It deals with important questions which have been discussed during the past half century, in other communions as well as in the Roman Catholic Church. The Pope deemed the time ripe for an authoritative utterance on these subjects, and he therefore directed the "Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition" to examine and define the whole body of modern heresy. They did so under sixty-five heads or propositions, which they submitted to the Pope with the recommendation that he issue a decree formally condemning and proscribing them. This he has done, and each and all of the doctrines stated are condemned and proscribed accordingly.

It is this method of dealing with difficult questions that has been one strong source of attraction to conscientious men in all times, and has drawn many eminent theologians from Protestantism. Such men have been the saintly Dr. Newman and the subtle Dr. Manning. They have passed, in entering the Roman Catholic communion, from the stormy sea of doubt into the quiet harbor in which they hear an authoritative voice commanding, "Peace, be still!" They no longer wrestled with puzzling questions, no longer attempted to find for themselves what was truth, but accepted the decision of the head of the church, as our lawyers and judges accept without question the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The difficulty, of course, is for a man to satisfy himself that the Pope, or any other person, has the power to pronounce in such difficult questions. The Protestant believes that no man has the right to tell him what he shall believe, and that his duty to his own soul requires him to study the questions for himself.

Most of the questions on which the Pope gives his decision are questions that agitate the Protestant church as well as the Roman Catholic. They are not denominational questions, but intensely individual. They separate Presbyterian from Presbyterian, Congregationalist from Congregationalist, and Episcopalian from Episcopalian. They lie below mere creed and disturb the very foundations of all religious belief. They are in fact the crucial questions which divide the old or orthodox school from the higher critics or modern school. The Pope takes his stand unequivocally with the orthodox school. The higher critics are informed, for example, that their contention that "Divine inspiration is not to be extended to the whole sacred Scripture, so as to render its parts, all and single, immune from all error," is a deadly heresy, as their brethren in General Assembly have repeatedly told them. The Evolutionists, too, learn that their belief that "The progress of science requires a remodeling of the conceptions of Christian doctrine concerning the creation," etc., is a deadly error, as they have been told again and again by the Princeton professors. The orthodox school thus has an eminent ally in the Pope, but it is possible that even his authority will not settle the dispute. The modern scholars may insist that every man be fully persuaded in his own mind.

The Wave of Crime

FOR the last few weeks in our larger cities there has been an unusually large number of crimes of violence committed; robberies, murders, and assaults. There have been many reasons assigned for this, among them being that the heat of summer brings to the surface latent criminal instincts in the degenerate and mentally unbalanced, and another that the strong arm of the law has become weak in some sections of the country, and the evil-doer has lost his respect for it.

As a result of these unfortunate conditions of affairs, and possibly because they have not confidence in the action of courts and juries, people have begun to go to extremes. A wave of hysteria seems to follow the wave of crime. Where outrages have been committed mobs have assembled and have endeavored to take the law into their own hands, even attacking officers who were attempting to take prisoners before the courts. In several instances the mob has fatally injured persons who were perfectly innocent of any wrongdoing, merely because some one has pointed out those persons as the guilty ones.

It is true that in the majority of cases the people accused have been so for good reason; but the guilt should be established by the proper authorities and not by a jury from the streets. In a number of instances it was proven that passersby had been wrongfully accused by some person who wished to see the excitement, like the incendiaries who amuse themselves by starting fires. It is to be hoped that a wave of sanity will follow the wave of hysteria, and that the American people will teach the criminal to respect the law by respecting it themselves. Otherwise they bring themselves to his level.

The "Wet" and the "Dry"

A GREAT temperance wave is sweeping over the South. Ninety counties in Kentucky, practically all of Tennessee, ninety counties in Texas, and a majority of the counties of North and South Carolina, Mississippi, and Georgia, according to late reports, are in solid line for "no license." Every State in the "cotton belt" has come out strongly for temperance.

One of the leading Southern papers, the Knoxville, Tenn., Sentinel, makes a remarkable comparison of the results of a "wet" year with those of a "dry" year in the same section of that State. It shows that the costs of conducting criminal cases in the "dry" year were less than half the costs in the "wet" year—a reduction from $5,074.76 to $2,076.21; that in the "wet" year there were 23 arrests for drunkenness in one month, whereas in two "dry" years together there were only 14; $1,500 more was expended for schools in the "dry" year, and the population increased 1,500 over the "wet" year census.

Even admitting that the territory conquered by the "drys" is for the most part rural, and that the large cities, like those of the North, are opposed to temperance reform, enough has been gained to stimulate strongly to further effort. Indeed, the campaign for sober communities has been extraordinarily successful this year. We trust that the movement may go forward triumphantly until every State in the Union, in whole or in part, feels its influence, and has an opportunity, each State within its own borders, of morally, socially and financially contrasting the "wet" with the "dry."

After the Great Famine

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

UP and down the Grand Canal—which was a great water-w two centuries before Columbus raised the cross on Americ soil—the name "American" has become the synonym for unfla ging zeal in the saving of life and the relief of suffering.

Of the foreign relief eighty per cent. came from America, and this fully sixty-five per cent. from the sheet-anchor of succor, T CHRISTIAN HERALD.

How the missionaries, with their wives, daughters and siste forewent all other occupations and bent their trained energies the saving of life, is a story thrice told but brimming full of hero self-sacrifice, contempt of danger, felicity of method, fulness deed. I am not given to enthusiasms, and there may be son weak brethren in the missionary folds (I haven't met them, as happens); but to those who faced the horrors in Kiangpeh I tend salute as I would to the heroes of any stricken field, or to the arm of helpers in other lands and other famines.

How many were fed? How many saved? How many perished "Boxer" governors in Anhui and Honan prevented foreign reli within the borders of those provinces. Tens of thousands, bea ing of the relief in Kiang-su, journeyed thither and were fed. B in the "mystery country," unvisited of any save the Chines themselves, hundreds of thousands perished. Viceroy Tuan-fan in Nanking, when expressing his gratitude to THE CHRISTIA HERALD, said to me:

"Your contributions have saved hundreds of thousands of live maybe a million or more."

Dr. James Woods at Tsingkiang-pu (a son of Virginia and a American to be proud of) chronicles that he and his helpers r lieved and saved 95,000 families, or half a million lives. What harvest of help and what a record to look back upon!

Last Friday, another high Chinese official, Taotai Tui-chen o Shanghai, called upon me to express his gratitude for what TH CHRISTIAN HERALD has done. He rules about 4,000,000 people an is a powerful, astute, learned gentleman. His message of thank fulness was earnest, dignified and, to all appearance, sincere. I this he follows the example set by his superiors, peers and subor dinates.

It is a disappointment, and the only one of moment in this cam paign of charity, that it was found infeasible to send aid to th famine sufferers in far-off Yunnan. High Chinese officials begged for some of our CHRISTIAN HERALD flour, and were profus in gratitude when their request was granted; but they reckoned without their host. Yunnan was too far away, the means o transportation too costly and the danger of the flour spoiling under malarial rains while en route, too great.

A steamer to take the flour from Shanghai to Hai-fen had been arranged for at a cost of about $2,000 gold. At Hai-fen it was purposed to send the relief as far up the Red River into Yunnan as the Indo-China railway, now being built by the French, could take it. The French governor-general of Annam was negotiating for free or greatly reduced railway transport, and if successful the cargo could have been put down within 100 miles of Meng'ze, where there are British and French consuls, and where a distributing centre was planned. American and British missionaries (of whom there are none in Yunnan) were to board the steamer from Shanghai and Hongkong and oversee the distribution.

It was the hundred miles of mountain transport on the backs of mules and horses that proved a fatal obstacle. Such transport costs eight taels a picul, a tael being worth about 72 3-10 cents in United States silver and a picul weighing 133 pounds. In the cargo are 14,000 piculs. It does not require a profound mathematician to calculate that the cost for the 100 miles was prohibitive. In addition, it was learned from the governor-general of Yunnan (who was enthusiastic at first, but drooped in spirit when the total cost confronted him), that the malarial rains were on and much of the flour would be exposed thereto and to almost certain damage.

Korea Under Tutelage

TROUBLE is once more reported from Korea. Listening to the Korean prince who had come to New York after his rebuff at The Hague, we should suppose that Japan had flung to the winds her pledges and was ruthlessly tyrannizing over the Korean kingdom. Listening to the story of Japan we should suppose that the Koreans were stubbornly resisting all attempts to improve their condition and were bent on being left alone in their barbarism and degradation. The situation to the disinterested observer closely resembles Egypt under English tutelage. It is very like the case of a dirty child that objects to being washed. The nurse may explain to the child that its health and comfort will be promoted by the washing, and may take hold of the child by main force and compel it to submit. Japan appears to have taken the latter course. Hence the protest and howl of complaint. At the close of the Russo-Japanese war Japan's influence in Korea was to be preeminant, and she pledged herself to respect the integrity and independence of the State. But she found the whole administration in a condition of deplorable corruption. The finances were in inextricable confusion; justice was openly bought and sold in the courts; there were no good roads, no schools, no hospitals, no banks. The Emperor and his nobles were inert, sunk in superstition and incapable of effecting reforms. The Marquis Ito might naturally have fallen into despair. But he set gorously to work. He raised a loan and organized a system of finance as a necessary beginning. Then, finding that the Emperor was an obstacle to all measures of reform, he convinced the Korean prime minister, an enlightened statesman, of the necessity of a change in the head of the government. The ancient precedents were respected and the Emperor was induced to abdicate and a new one was installed who would be amenable to Japanese influence. A convention was drawn up and signed by the new Emperor, which gives the Japanese minister a controlling power over every branch of the government. He has the right of veto of every enactment and all control over appointments and the administration of justice. This sweeping change making the Japanese resident-general the practical ruler of Korea has been resisted by a portion of the army and by the office-holding class, but the bulk of the nation is said to be satisfied, having borne for many generations the oppression and corruption of the native rulers. It is difficult to see how Japan could have effected the reforms in any other way. It is satisfactory to learn, in view of our distance from the scene of trouble and in view of the contradictory reports received, that an American observer so eminent and impartial as Professor G. T. Ladd, who has made an extended visit to Korea, approves the course Japan has taken and has sanguine hopes of the development of the country under the new administration.

For the transgression of a land, many are the princes thereof: but by men of understanding and knowledge the state thereof shall be prolonged. (Prov. 28 : 2.)

A Cure for Meningitis

A dispatch from Castalia, O., makes the announcement that a serum has been discovered which will cure meningitis. It appears that Dr. Ladd, of the Lakeside Hospital, worked with Dr. Flexner, of New York, in his experiments, by which the serum was discovered. When an epidemic of the disease broke out at Castalia, an appeal was made to Dr. Ladd for help. Dr. Flexner was in Europe, but Dr. Ladd was able to obtain some of the serum, which he applied in three cases which were abandoned as hopeless. In each case the patient recovered, though, as the Castalia doctors declare, the death of all was humanly certain if the serum had not been applied. In future no patient afflicted with the disease will be given up until the serum has been tried. People do not act as to physical diseases as they act about the deadly spiritual malady of sin, which always yields to the remedy God has provided.

In that day there shall be a fountain opened . . . for sin and for uncleanness. (Zech. 13 : 1.)

Morocco in Panic

In spite of the recent settlement at Algeciras, Morocco is again in riotous disorder. The difficulty arose out of native prejudice. Improvements have been begun on the harbor of Casablanca, a seaport of 25,000 inhabitants, about 150 miles from Tangier. Some progress had been made when the chief of the Kabyles, a powerful Moroccan tribe, entered Casablanca, and ordered the mayor of the city to stop the work. He politely explained that he could not obey, as the Sultan had ordered it to be done. On the next morning the tribesmen returned, proclaimed a holy war, and called on the inhabitants to slaughter the foreigners, the native Christians and the Jews. The response was prompt. Five Frenchmen, two Spaniards and one Italian are known to have been slain, and it is feared that many others were killed and their bodies thrown into the sea. All the foreigners that could escape took refuge in the consulates, which were besieged by the tribesmen. The Sultan apologized for the outrage, but when a French force was sent to deliver the refugees in the consulates, it was met by Moorish government troops, who vigorously opposed the entrance. The French charged with the bayonet and drove the Moors away. By that time French and Spanish vessels arrived and bombarded the native portion of the city. The tribesmen, joined by the government troops, thereupon began to loot the houses. The shops of the Jews were plundered and their owners brutally killed, and all foreign residences were stripped. The people killed in the riot and those destroyed by the bombardment make up a horrible total. The affray will probably lead to foreign control of the country.

Behold what great tumults are therein, and what oppressions in the midst thereof, for they know not to do right who store up violence and robbery in their palaces. Therefore an adversary shall be round about the land and he shall bring down thy strength. (Amos 3: 9-11.)

A Useless Bell

An experiment was made recently at Oakdale, on the Long Island Railroad, to determine the value of a warning bell. The railroad has many crossings at grade, and at some of them there is an automatic arrangement which causes a bell to ring at the crossing when a train is approaching. Some influential people, to whom the management of the road felt bound to pay attention, complained recently that their sons were nearly run over by a train at the crossing, because the bell did not utter its warning voice. The boys were in an automobile and declared positively that the bell did not ring, and yet, when they were crossing the tracks, a train came swiftly, almost grazing the tonneau of the car. It was naturally supposed that the automatic appliance had failed to operate; but the managers examined the mechanism and found it in working order. It then occurred to them that perhaps the sound of the bell had been drowned by the noise of the automobile. The president of the road determined to make a test. He obtained an automobile similar to that the boys were driving, and ran up to the edge of the tracks when the bell was ringing. As he had suspected, he was unable to hear the bell while the automobile was in motion, though he heard it distinctly while it was standing still. Thus the contention on both sides was justified, and the mystery was solved. It is often so in the crises of life. God warns his people, and they would be kept safely if they would listen to it; but the noise by the way and the hurry of their own movements drowns the warning voice and they rush headlong into danger.

Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left. (Isa. 30: 21.)

Asks to Be Deported

The penalty so greatly dreaded by foreign immigrants is sought by a member of an English aristocratic family. He says he does not like this country, does not think he would prosper here, and wants to be sent back at the expense of some one else. He declares that he should not have been admitted, as he has a criminal record. Twenty years ago while in a hotel in London he was arrested on the charge of stealing a pocket-book from one of his fellow guests. He does not say whether he was guilty, but that he was discharged because there was not enough evidence to convict him. Some years later he was at a festival in Aberdeen, and was there arrested on the charge of robbing the Lord Chief Justice. There was not sufficient evidence in that case either, but he was sentenced to three months' imprisonment as a vagrant. On his release, his wife, he naively says, was not friendly to him any longer. She belongs to a noble family and felt the disgrace of his "misfortunes" keenly. She said that if he would go to America and never return to her, she would pay his passage and give him a hundred dollars to begin life with here. He had spent the hundred dollars, and was anxious to get back in spite of his promise to her. The immigration commissioners will do their best to oblige him. There is no place on earth where the evil doer is welcome.

They are as stubble before the wind, and as chaff that the storm carrieth away. (Job 21: 18.)

A GREAT OPPORTUNITY MISSED

International Sunday School Lesson for September 1

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN about three months from the time of the Israelites' departure from Egypt they reached the southern border of the Land of Promise. By what easy stages they had taken the journey will be seen when it is told that modern travelers have covered the same ground, a distance not over one hundred and seventy miles, in eleven days. God had indeed led them on safely, so that even their little ones should not be weary. And the voice of Moses was heard, saying: "Behold, Jehovah thy God hath set the land before thee: go up; take possession, as Jehovah the God of thy fathers hath spoken unto thee; fear not, neither be dismayed." Did the people go forward? No, one and all made request of Moses that he should first send men to spy out the land and see what were the difficulties ahead of them, and whether or not it really was a good land. Particularly did they wish to know whether there were strong foes living in cities that they must overcome. If they had trusted in God, they would have moved straight forward.

Moses conferred with God, and in kind patience God said: "Of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, every one a prince among them." And Moses divided these twelve spies into two bands; one to go the whole length of the land, with Joshua as leader; the other, under Caleb, to go into the hill country, distant not more than a hundred miles from the camp, and near the spot where Abraham had first set up his altar, and received God's promise that he and his children should inherit the land.

Discouraged by the Spies

Caleb's party was of course the first to return, and they brought with them specimens of the luscious fruits to be found there: figs and pomegranates, and a cluster of grapes so large that it had to be carried on a pole between two men. It was not a miraculously large bunch of grapes, but such as are now grown in California and other parts of the world, weighing about twenty-five pounds—not too heavy for one man to carry, but carried by two men to keep the grapes from being crushed. The enthusiasm of the people was great when they saw the "samples." Then, after forty days the company under Joshua returned. If they brought fruits we are not told so. And when the reports of both deputations were made to the assembled people, it was to the effect that the whole land was filled with many and strong foes, some of whom were giants, of such size and strength that the Israelites were made to feel like grasshoppers in their sight. There was a drop in the enthusiasm of the people, and they began to wail and say they wished they had died in Egypt, or along the way. Murmuring had ever been their besetting sin.

Caleb stilled the people, and tried to put courage into them by saying: "Let us go up at once and possess it, for we are able to overcome it." But the people still wailed, and proposed choosing a captain who should lead them back to Egypt. Moses and Aaron fell upon their faces on the ground, and bewailed the wickedness and the weakness of the people. And Joshua stood up in their midst and spoke brave words, urging them to go forward in the strength of God. But the people only resumed their wailing and Joshua in grief at their conduct rent his garments, as also did Caleb, and the people stoned them. The ten men, the princes who had gone up with Joshua and Caleb, spoke no words to encourage the people, but had only an evil report to make.

Penalty of Distrust

God was angry at the people, because they did not trust him. Moses interposed and pleaded with God for them. God heard him, but such sin as that of the people must be punished. So it was decreed, and sentence was pronounced that none of those who were of full age should enter the land except Joshua and Caleb. All the others should wander until they died, and their children grown up.

The people wailed again, and became wilful, and proposed in their own strength to go forward into the land without the strong arm of Jehovah to defend them; they were beaten back by the Amalekites with great slaughter. The opportunity for that whole generation had been lost.

Cowardice of the Doubter

"See the land what it is." The Israelites should have gone straight ahead into the Land of Promise on God's reiterated promise. He knew all about the "land" and the "people" and the "cities" and "strongholds," and he had said that he would give his people whatever of the land they would set their feet upon. But God is patient even with our unreasonable doubts, and is willing we should test his promises, and especially that we should count the cost of obedience to his commands. And so the twelve spies went into Canaan under Moses' order. Face the obstacle, but fear not. The trouble was with ten of the spies, that they saw the obstacles towering high, the giants, the city walls, but did not, like Caleb and Joshua, see the Most High towering above them all.

This very story affords the honest doubter an excellent chance to spy out the truthfulness of the Bible. For almost every particular of this story which was once the sport of infidels we now have abundant confirmation. Does any one think the story mythical of a cluster of grapes so big that it needed to be carried by two men on a staff? But Kitto tells us of a bunch of grapes from a Syrian vine sent by the Duke of Portland in 1819 to the Marquis of Buckingham, that weighed nineteen pounds, which was borne to its destination by four laborers, two of whom bore it alternately on a staff. Peloubet tells of a bunch of Philadelphia grapes, grown in 1845, that was two feet, four and five-eighths inches in length, and three feet across the shoulders or wings. And the Boston Cultivator, in 1881, described a cluster weighing twenty-three pounds and five ounces, which was twenty-four inches long and twenty inches wide at the shoulders. That cities of Canaan were walled and hard to capture in that period is shown by pictures on the walls of Karnak, describing their capture by Thotmes III., Seti I. and Rameses II. The Egyptian monuments also show that the Hittites, here referred to as "They came to the brook Eshcol and cut thence one cluster of grapes" were a powerful people of that time, in whom even the Egyptians found foemen worthy of their steel. The Amorites are also pictured on Egyptian monuments. The "spies" of to-day who go into Bible lands to test the Word of God, find on every side confirmations of its minute truthfulness in the buried cities, the uncovered slabs, the customs, the names of places, the very configuration of the country. "See the land" and you will find abundant confirmations of the Book.

Formidable Foes

"We were in our own sight as grasshoppers." It is all right to have a low estimate of ourselves when it doe[s] involve, as in this case, a low estim[ate] of God. The Israelites should have [seen] that while they were as grassho[ppers] compared with the warlike giants, [the] giants themselves were as grassho[ppers] compared to the Most High. The [statue] of the Royal Exchange in London [im]ports a huge brass grasshopper. [The] story of it is that while a car[riage] paused at the wayside for the chi[ldren] who were in it to play, one of the [boys] chasing a grasshopper was led to [the] place where a baby boy had been a[ban]doned. The foundling was adopted [and] subsequently as Sir Thomas Gres[ham] founded the Royal Exchange. Isr[ael's] "leading men" did not lead as "g[rass]hoppers" to any good result, but onl[y to] doubt and fear. Even the lowliest o[ne] may help to save a child, and through [the] child, if not otherwise, do some g[reat] service to the world.

Confidence by Faith

"We are well able to overcome [it]." Joshua and Caleb brought not only [the] fruit of the land but the fruitage [of] faith in their own brave words.

Moshesh, a chief of Basutoland, s[aw], when the missionaries came to his t[ribe], that the message about God seemed g[ood], but it was like an egg and he would [wait] to see what it would hatch out. [He] waited and watched the missionaries, [and] at last said that he was satisfied with [the] results and was convinced that the m[es]sage was not only about God, but fr[om] God.

Dr. Luering, of the Methodist Miss[ion] in India, went among the head-hunt[ing] Dyaks and preached to them. W[ell] after some time he was recalled to Sin[ga]pore, the chief asked him to send a m[an] in his place. Dr. Luering replied: "Y[ou] do not really seem to want a mission[ary] for you have not followed my teachin[g]. have you become a Christian, you [and] your people?" The chieftain now p[ro]nounced a truth which no Christ[ian] should ever forget, saying: "Sir, [we] have heard your preaching, and, as w[hite] men, we have watched your living, a[nd] now see that both agree, your preachi[ng] and your living, so that we are willing [to] become Christians. You have told [us] many good things, you have made [our] mouths water, and now you withdr[aw] the food and leave us to ourselves. W[ill] you not send us a missionary?"

There was in Caleb and Joshua th[at] quality that makes leaders in all lands [and] consecrated will.

There is no chance, no destiny, no fate,
Can circumvent, or hinder, or control
The firm resolve of a determined soul.
Gifts count for nothing; will alone is great.
All things give way before it, soon or late.
What obstacle can stay the mighty force
Of the sea-seeking river in its course,
Or cause the ascending orb of day to wait?
Each well-born soul must win what it deserves.
Let the fool prate of luck. The fortunate
Is he whose earnest purpose never swerves,
Whose slightest action or inaction serves
The one great aim. Why, even death stands st[ill]
And waits an hour sometimes for such a will.

—ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

"Faint heart never won fair lady," or a fair land or anything else wort[h] having. At Kadesh Barnea, as at many other places, was not "the voice of God." Majorities are often wrong, and it takes rare cour[a]ge whether at Kadesh Barnea or in Babylon to be "in the right with two or three." "Were there not ten cleansed but where are the nine?" said Jesus. Among young men to whom Christianity has brought great privileges only one in ten bows gratefully in consecration to the Prince of young men.

"The Voice of the People"

Americans have always found many analogies between God's leading of his ancient people and his leading of our fathers in the settlement and development of our own "land of promise," which has prompted an exodus of the oppressed from many lands. But writing this lesson in China we are greatly impressed from a missionary point of view with the fact that God is leading China, "the land of Sinim," to make it one of the greatest, as it is the most numerous, of races.

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

By Isabella Macfarlane

NOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

he period is that of the revocation of the Edict Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants free n of worship in parts of France. The de Bonoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble honor the grandmother's birthday. Among se present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding m the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly apar and take possession of the house. Captain lard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. r father sends her to some relatives, while he kes preparations to get his family on board p to escape to America. Pastor Marquand urns to his home disguised as a mendicant. opers come to arrest him, but take Louis, staking him for the pastor, as he had put on father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but ves a note on the fly-leaf of a psalm book exining his plight. Gabrielle remains with her ot, Madame Bertrand, in the country. With r cousin Rosalie she attends the festival of the owning of the Rosiere. While there, Captain ard suddenly appears to pay court to her. buffed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonfoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened her lover. Her father leaves. Gabrielle takes g walks through the forest to be alone with r grief. Again Captain Girard comes, and this e asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him r heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exption of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She 's out, and the driver discovers he has had a guenot as a passenger. He runs to give the arm. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured a coast guard, who takes her to a convent. e nuns try to convert her. Late at night she enches the bars from her window and escapes the shore.

CHAPTER X

The Fisherman's Boat

THERE was no one to welcome Gabrielle to the Three Windmills. There was not a gleam of light to be seen, either in e houses or on the fishing-craft moored the shore. The whole place was rapped in darkness, for it was long st midnight.

Gabrielle pressed on toward the landg—now stumbling over a coil of rope r a spar left carelessly on the path—w swaying from the path and getting ntangled in a fishing net spread out on e grass to dry—and still with that wful dread at her heart that the fisherman might be gone.

No! There he was, in his fisher-coat nd slouch hat, waiting for her.

"Oh, how good and kind of you to wait long and patiently for me!" she exlaimed, stepping on board.

"You are late," said the man, in a ruff voice, without offering to help her, t which she wondered, for in France ven a fisherman or a peasant is by ature polite to a woman.

"Yes," she replied, "I was unavoidably indered. First the carrier's wagon pset me on the road. Then I walked ome distance, when a coast-guard arested me and took me to Saint Mary's onvent. There the nuns shut me up in cell, but I managed to escape. And ow that I have come, and found you so aithful, I feel that my troubles are early at an end. I assure you my father ill reward you liberally for your fidelity hen we reach the ship."

It was a beautiful night, now verging owards morning. There was no moon, ut the bright starlight softened the larkness, glinting on the breaking waves f the Bay of Biscay, and turning the rops that fell from the oars into thouands of sparkling diamonds.

The man rowed on in silence—a silence hich Gabrielle, grateful for the rest to er weary body and the near approach of elief to her perturbed and anxious mind, id not attempt to break, but spent in a oiceless prayer of thanksgiving.

On a sudden the man stopped rowing, nd, resting on his oars, said, in his atural voice,

"Gabrielle! It is I!"

"Captain Girard!" she exclaimed, in tones of astonishment and consternation, half rising from her seat in her excitement. "What does this mean?"

"It means that I have bought out your fisherman and his boat. It means that I am taking you, myself, to the English ship. It means that I—Francis Girard—love you so intensely that I am going with you, to England, to America, to the world's end! I am leaving all for your sake, Gabrielle."

The girl was so astounded at these words that for some moments she could not speak. That he was in earnest she could not doubt—the tones of his voice, the agitation of his manner, proclaimed it.

Recovering herself, she said, half in displeasure, half in compassion:

"You are leaving all for my sake, you say. What are you leaving, Captain Girard? Your king, your country, your oath of allegiance, your duty as a soldier, your honor as a man. You are branding yourself as a deserter, disgracing an honorable name, breaking your mother's heart—and all for what? For an illusion—a dream that can never be fulfilled!"

"Cruel girl! will nothing move you? Is not the living love of a living man more to be desired than a dead love—or one as good as dead? And the sacrifice I am about to make—does it not appeal to you?"

"Do you think I would accept such a sacrifice? No, never! Come, Captain Girard, be a man! Conquer this insane passion that is leading you astray! Turn the boat! Take me back to the Three Windmills—let the fisherman carry me to the ship—and do you return to your duties."

He made no reply, but sat gazing on her with his whole soul in his eyes, the ring of her voice yet vibrating on his ear. The boat drifted lightly on the waves. The stars shone in their purity like innumerable eyes watching from the heavens, and in the distance the dim outline of the Lively Polly could be discerned.

Suddenly, without a word, but a deep-drawn sigh that was almost a groan, Girard dropped his oars in the water, and began to row with quick, nervous strokes.

"Where are you going?" said Gabrielle, suspiciously, for she saw that he had not changed the course of the boat.

"To the English ship. I shall put you on board of her, and then—I shall return—to my duties. You have saved me, Gabrielle," he faltered.

"Oh, brave!" she cried, clasping her hands. "Now you are a true soldier! He is the greatest conqueror who conquers himself! I give you joy of your victory!"

With drooping head and dejected air (not at all indicative of victory!) he rowed on.

"Since it must be, farewell! I yield to fate. But I love you still, Gabrielle. I shall love you till I die!"

"And I," said she, "though I cannot return your love, have learned to respect and honor you, and shall always remember you as a gallant soldier who fought a battle with himself, and won it!"

"Here the sharp cut of the overseer's lash on the shoulders of both admonished them that they were transgressing the rules"

A few more strokes, and they were alongside the vessel.

Girard hailed the ship's company, who answered with alacrity, having been much alarmed by the unexpected delay of the fisherman's boat and Gabrielle.

As soon as he saw her safe in the arms of her father, he rowed away with swift strokes, no one on the ship having discovered that he was other than he seemed to be, a fisherman.

"She is lost to me," he mused, as he rowed, "and yet not wholly lost. The very thought of her will be like a guardian angel to me in the future. Through my mother's influence I shall exchange into a regiment on foreign service. I am sick of those brutal dragonnades—the conception of a wicked woman and a fanatical priest who mould the king to their will. A soldier's business is to fight the enemies of his country—not to ride roughshod over his countrymen and countrywomen. Yes, Gabrielle, if I never see you again, I shall be a better man for having known and loved you."

Thus he anticipated the sentiment of the poet of another land who in after years should write:

"I hold it true, whate'er befall;
I feel it when I sorrow most:
'Tis better to have loved and lost
Than never to have loved at all."

As he approached the landing at the Three Windmills, he became aware of an excited throng of people assembled there, among whom he observed some members of the coast patrol.

The moment he stepped ashore, one of these functionaries advanced, and touching him on the shoulder, said in a tone of authority:

"Captain Girard, I arrest you in the name of the king!"

"For what? you impudent fellow!" said Girard, trying to shake him off.

"For assisting a Huguenot to escape. Did you not use Christophe's boat to carry a woman to a vessel in the bay? and as a proof are you not wearing Christophe's hat and coat this very minute?"

"It is true," said Girard, pale but calm. "Do your duty."

"I suppose you know the penalty, Captain," said the officer, as Girard returned the hat and coat to the rascal fisherman who had betrayed him, and resumed his own garments.

"Yes, I know the penalty. It is the galleys for life. Do your duty."

CHAPTER XI

In the King's Cabinet Again

AS in our former visit to the king's cabinet, Louis sat in his easy chair, Madame in hers, on either side of the hearth, where a small fire of wood was burning.

Father La Chaise stood in a respectful attitude near the king, his crafty eyes cast down, his features composed to a becoming gravity.

The king was reading a missive from Lonvois, his prime minister, which seemed to give him great pleasure. Madame de Maintenon was as usual engaged on her embroidery.

"Sixty thousand conversions in one district! Twenty thousand in another! so writes Lonvois," said the king, excitedly. "Glorious! glorious! At that rate we shall soon see the heretics extirpated, and all France under the one church!"

"It is indeed cause for rejoicing," said the Jesuit.

Here an attendant appeared at the door, announcing that the Countess of

WHAT'S THE USE?

To Pour in Coffee When it Acts as a Vicious Enemy.

Fasters have gone without food for many days at a time, but no one can go without sleep. "For a long time I have not been sleeping well, often lying awake for two or three hours during the night, but now I sleep sound every night and wake up refreshed and vigorous," says a Calif. woman

"Do you know why? It's because I used to drink coffee, but I finally cut it out and began using Postum. Twice since then I have drank coffee and both times I passed a sleepless night, and so I am doubly convinced coffee caused the trouble and Postum removed it.

"My brother was in the habit of drinking coffee three times a day. He was troubled with sour stomach, and I would often notice him getting soda from the can to relieve the distress in his stomach; hardly hardly a day passed without a dose of soda for relief.

"Finally he tried a cup of Postum and liked it so well he gave up coffee, and since then has been drinking Postum in its place and says he has not once been troubled with sour stomach."

Even after this lady's experience with coffee her brother did not suspect for a time that coffee was causing his sour stomach, but easily proved it

Coffee is not suspected in thousands of cases just like this, but it's easily proved. A ten days' trial works wonders. "There's a Reason."

Belvoisin desired an audience of the king. A lady of fine appearance and aristocratic bearing entered the room. It was the mother of Francis Girard.

She advanced with faltering steps, and threw herself on her knees before the king.

"Grace! your Majesty, mercy! Pardon for my son, who has been condemned to the galleys!" she cried.

"What has the young scapegrace been doing?" asked the king unfeelingly.

"Alas! your Majesty, he has done nothing to deserve such a doom. He is accused of helping a Huguenot woman to escape—that is all."

"That is enough," said Louis, gruffly. "What think you, Françoise?"

"I think it would be bad policy to set this young man at liberty," said Madame de Maintenon, looking with malignant eyes at the countess, whom she disliked for her devotion to the late queen. "The young man would hardly have run such risks for the woman unless he had been in love with her. If he is freed, he will follow her, and there will be another of those unnatural marriages between Catholics and heretics that are the bane and scandal of the church."

"And what is your opinion, father?"

"I agree with what Madame has said," replied Père La Chaise, in his soft, insinuating voice; "only I think the punishment too lenient. He should have been put to death, that others might be deterred from following his example."

"You hear, Countess, the opinions of my advisers. I shall therefore not interpose in the matter."

He made a gesture of dismissal, and the broken-hearted woman tottered from the room, her eyes blinded with tears.

The king resumed his reading, the lady her embroidery, and the priest went home to the fine house which the king had given him in the suburbs of Paris, and walked in his beautiful garden, inhaling the perfume of the flowers, contemplating the beauties of nature, and thanking God for having made him the instrument of doing so much good.

CHAPTER XII

The Slaves of the Oar

THE horrors of the chain-gang and the galleys have been described so often by abler pens, that there is no need to harrow the feelings of the reader with the details of the sufferings undergone by Louis Marquand. They were in no whit different in a general sense from those narrated by a Victor Hugo or a Lew Wallace; or from those actually experienced by the great reformer John Knox, who labored for eighteen months in the French galleys.

The long, weary tramp of the "chain," of which he formed the one hundred and fifty-first member, was in some respects the hardest of all, owing to the weight of the chains and the iron collars.

Sixteen days the journey occupied between La Rochelle and Marseilles. More than one unfortunate, worn out by suffering, fell in his tracks and died. But Louis, young and vigorous, and sustained by a lofty courage born of faith in God, reached his destination in fairly good condition.

After lying in prison for some time, he was assigned to a large galley, appropriately named La Grande, propelled by two hundred and seventy rowers each of the long sweeps manned by four or five slaves of the oar, chained together.

At each end of the galley was a short deck, the one to accommodate the captain and officers, the other for the fighting men and the guns. Between the two decks, in the "waist" of the ship, were fifty-four benches, twenty-seven on a side, on which sat the rowers, whose whole business in life, says one, was to tug at the fifty-four oars. Between the two lines of rowers ran the bridge, on which stood two boatswains armed with long whips, which they laid on the bare backs of the rowers on the least provocation.

Half fed and over-worked, cramped in narrow space, and subjected to many cruelties, Louis never for a moment regretted his self-sacrifice.

"I can stand this," he would say to himself; "but he—never."

This conviction was brought home to him very closely when he had been some three or four months in bondage.

One of his oar-mates, the one who sat next to him, was a man about his father's age. He was a pale, refined-looking gentleman, who had evidently never been accustomed to hard work. His white, delicate hands could scarcely grasp the great oar.

At length, one day, he collapsed altogether. His chains were taken off, and he was carried to the hospital, where, in a few days, he died.

Louis saw his father's case reflected in this one, and rejoiced to think he had been enabled to save him from it through his prompt acquiescence in the tipsy soldier's mistake.

The rower assigned to the dead man's place was about Louis' own age, or a little younger. He was of fine physique, tall, erect, and of a military carriage.

The two young men looked at each other. They had met before, on the memorable day of the birthday fête; but they did not recognize each other. So slight had been the rencontre, and so great was the change caused by the cropped hair, the uncared-for beard, and life-convict garb—red blouse and green cap—which both of them wore, in place of the brilliant uniform and seemly citizen's dress, that this was not surprising. To Louis especially, even had he noticed the resemblance, it would never have occurred to connect a galley-slave with the dashing young cavalry officer whom he had seen ordering a dragonnade; while Girard's thoughts were so full of his own misfortunes—his blighted love, his loss of liberty, his ruined life, his military career brought to an ignominious close—that there was no room to think of any one else.

"What is your name?" whispered Louis to his new row-mate, when the guard's head was turned the other way; for the slaves were not allowed to converse.

"I have no name. They have taken my name from me, and given me only a number in place of it. I am 15,517."

"That is my case also. I am 12,175. But you have a Christian name? Mine is Louis."

"And mine is Francis."

By these names, therefore, they became known to each other, not seeking to inquire further; and a pleasant friendship sprang up between them, neither of them dreaming that the mention of one other name might embroil them in a feud.

"Are you of the Religion?" asked Louis one day.

"No, I am a Catholic."

"Then why are you here?"

"For the love of a woman—the pearl of her sex."

"I also love a woman, who is to me the pearl of her sex. But she had nothing to do with bringing me here. How did your love for this woman bring you to the galleys? Did you kill her lover?"

No. I wanted to kill him—but it was beyond my power."

"What, then, was the trouble?"

"She is a Huguenot. She wished to leave France. I assisted her to escape. I was discovered; and here I am, condemned to the galleys for life."

"Does she love you?"

"No. If she had loved me, she would not have gone away. She would have found safety in my arms, as my wife."

Here the sharp cut of the overseer's lash on the shoulders of both admonished them that they were transgressing the rules.

Francis Girard relapsed into gloomy silence, and the subject was not renewed between them.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Help for the Inert*

FEW stories more suggestive of a common error have ever been told on the evangelistic platform than one related by Gipsy Smith. It had to do with an inquirer who came to one of his meetings. He was evidently in great distress about his soul, and an indiscreet worker was talking with him in the usual way. The inquirer admitted that he was a sinner and acknowledged that Jesus was able to save him and that he was willing to save him. "Why, you are a Christian already," said his adviser. "The jailer at Philippi had only to believe this and he was saved." But the inquirer shook his head. "I am not a Christian," he said, "though I believe in Jesus and all the truths of the Bible as fully and firmly as you do. The trouble with me is that I cannot obey the injunction of the prophet, 'Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts.' I cannot forsake them. I know the sin; I know it will be my ruin, but I love it and cannot give it up." That is the condition of more persons than the evangelists realize. They would be saved, if believing would do it, but that kind of belief is useless. It is a dead faith, not the living faith of the Gospel.

The apostle Paul draws a vivid picture of a man in this condition (Rom. 7: 14-24) knowing what is good, desiring it, yet shrinking back from performance. He is like a patient desiring passionately to recover his health, fully convinced that a certain system of treatment is right, and that he has a physician skilful and able to apply it; yet he keeps the physician's prescriptions by his bedside and does not have them made up. We really pity such a man. He has not the will or the courage to do the right and only effective thing. As a man whose limb is gangrened and must be amputated to save his life, shrinks from the operation till it is too late, so these weak sinners shrink from following Christ's advice: "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off," etc. They say they cannot, and they really cannot, of themselves. It is to such as these that Christ offers his help. It is for these that the Holy Spirit is sent into the world. The man who begins the struggle in the firm conviction that God will help him to conquer, receives help that astonishes him.

The Divine Call*

DEEPLY impressive is this plain statement of Christ's purpose in calling and ordaining his people. He made it himself, so there can be no mistake about it. He calls them that they may bear fruit. This is so clear and definite, that it behooves every one who calls himself by the name of Christ, to ask himself if the purpose is fulfilled in his life. "Has Christ reason to be disappointed in having called me?" The question is easily answered by the other, "Am I bringing forth fruit?" A man engages an employee to do a certain duty—say to audit his books. When he comes to take account of the employee's service, it is useless for him to say he has taken care of the stock, he has seen certain customers, or has effected certain improvements. If he has not audited the books, the thing he was engaged to do, he has failed. The fig tree in the parable may have had an abundance of leaves, it may have been an ornament to the landscape, but it was put there to bring forth figs; and as it did not do that, the sentence was pronounced, "Cut it down." The Christian may be a useful man in the church, a liberal giver, a regular attendant at prayer-meeting—all good qualities—but the main question is, Is he bearing fruit? It was for this purpose he was called and ordained.

No man should suppose that he has been saved, solely on his own account. It must be a matter of continual rejoicing to him if he feels that he has been saved, but the purpose goes far beyond his own soul. He is expected to become a branch of the vine and to bear fruit. That is essential. In no other way can he show his gratitude to Christ, in no other way can he prove that he is alive. It is not necessary that he should leave his business and win souls by preaching, but in his own sphere and among his own friends he may use his influence for Christ. There are some around him that would yield to his appeals who would be deaf to those of a preacher. They know that he is disinterested and that he seeks only the good of those he appeals to. They know that he has tried religion and knows its effect. His very position gives his words weight. He may win souls in whatsoever place he occupies. Woe to any of us that neglect the opportunity!

MIDSUMMER DAYS

The Summer! the Summer! the exquisite time
Of the red rose's blush, and the nightingale's chime;
The chant of the lark, and the boom of the bee,—
The season of brightness, and beauty, and glee!
It is here—it is here! it is lighting again,
With sun-braided smile, the deep heart of the glen;
It is touching the mountain and tinging the hill.
My footsteps have been where the violet sleeps.
And where arches of eglantine hang from the steeps;
I have startled the linnet from thickets of shade.
And roused the fleet stag as he bask'd in the glade;
And my spirit is blithe—as a rivulet clear,
For the Summer, the golden-crowned Summer is here!

PASTY FOOD
Too Commonly Used

The use of pasty cereals is not advisable. A physician says: "Pasty cereals are very indigestible and a bad thing for the stomach, causing a depressed feeling and quite a train of disorders, particularly of the intestines and nerves.

"Cereals, such as wheat and oats, can be cooked long enough and well enough to fit them for human use, but the ordinary way of cooking leaves them in a pasty condition."

An Indiana man says: "My physician prohibited the use of coffee and tea, but I was in a bad condition physically and was prostrated by dyspepsia. He said the heavy pasty was indigestible, but that Grape-Nuts, being thoroughly cooked food and cooked in such a manner as to change the starch into a form of sugar, is very easily digested.

"I have become very fond, indeed, of Grape-Nuts and all the uncomfortable feelings have disappeared. I have gained nearly twenty pounds in weight and have none of the depressed feeling after my meals which I had formerly. Grape-Nuts food has done the work." "There's a Reason." GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Nathaniel Bacon's Return*

AS if "animated with new courage," the bit of an army marched onward toward Jamestown, with speed "outstripping the swift wings of fame," for love and faith lightened their steps. The only stop was in New Kent County, where, halting long enough to gain some new troops, their number was increased to three hundred. Weak and weary, ragged and soiled as was the little army, the home-coming was a veritable triumphal progress. The dwellers along the way came out of their houses praying aloud for the happiness of the people's champion, and railing against the governor and his party. Seeing the Indian captives whom Bacon's men led along, they shouted their thanks for his care and his pains for their preservation, and brought forth fruits and bread for the refreshment of himself and his soldiers. Women cried out that if need be they would come and serve under him. His young wife proudly wrote a friend in England: "You never knew any better beloved than he is. I do verily believe that rather than he should come to any hurt by the governor or anybody else, they would most of them lose their lives."

Rumors of the governor's warlike preparations for his coming were received by Bacon with a coolness bound to inspire those under him with confidence in his and their own strength. Hearing that Sir William had with him in Jamestown a thousand men, "well armed and resolute," he nonchalantly made answer that he would soon see how resolute they were, for he was going to try them. When told that the governor had sent out a party of sixty mounted scouts to watch his movements, he said, with a smile, that they were welcome to come near enough to say, "How d'ye," for he feared them not.

Toward evening upon September 13, after a march of between thirty and forty miles since dayhreak, the army reached Green Spring, Sir William Berkeley's own fair estate near Jamestown—the home which had been the centre of so much that was distinguished and charming in the social life of the colony during the Cavalier days. In a green field here Bacon again gathered his men around him for a final word to them before marching upon the capital. In a ringing appeal he told them that if they would ever fight they would do so now, against all the odds that confronted them—the enemy having every advantage of position, places of retreat, and men fresh and unwearied, while they were "so few, weak and tired."

"But I speak not this to discourage you," he added, "but to acquaint you with what advantages they will neglect and lose." He assured them that their enemies had not the courage to maintain the charges so boldly made that they were rebels and traitors.

"Come on, my hearts of gold," he cried. "He that dies in the field, lies in the bed of honor."

With these words the Rebel once more moved onward, and drew up his "small tired body of men" in an old Indian field just outside of Jamestown. He promptly announced his presence there in the dramatic and picturesque fashion that belonged to the time. Riding forward upon the Sandy Beach—a narrow neck of land which then connected the town with the mainland, but has since been washed away, making Jamestown an island—he commanded a trumpet-blast to be sounded, and fired off his carbine. From out the stillness of the night the salute was heard, and immediately, and with all due ceremony, answered by a trumpeter within the town. These martial greetings exchanged, Bacon dismounted from his horse, surveyed the situation and ordered an earthwork to be cast up across the neck of land, thus cutting off all communication between the capital and the rest of the colony except by water. Two axes and two spades were all the tools at the Rebel's command, but all night long his faithful men worked like beavers beneath the bright September moon. Trees came crashing down, bushes were cut and earth heaped up, and before daybreak the fortification was complete and the besiegers were ready for battle.

"The Storm of Bacon's Rebellion," from which the above extract is taken, is one of the most interesting books dealing with American colonial history that has been published for some time. The rebellion occurred in Virginia in 1676, and had a great effect on the later history of the country. The author, Mary Newton Stanard, has evidently been thorough in her researches and has presented the material in such a way as to make the book as fascinating as a romance. 181 pp.; cloth cover; price $1. Americans in the Kingston Earthquake

THE great earthquake which entirely destroyed the city of Kingston on January 14, also swept away the means of livelihood of most of the Americans residing there. Their homes and places of business were annihilated, and unless something is done to relieve the present sufferings before the October rainy season, untold misery, sickness and death are sure to follow.

As the insurance companies refuse to pay any portion of their losses, they have absolutely nothing to start life anew with, and unless they can get help from their own people, they are down and out for good and all. The sad mistake made by ex-Governor Swettenham, in sending away our boys at a time when they were doing such good work, and were so much needed, is greatly regretted by every one. It not only increased the suffering, but it caused the whole world to discount the truth of the report of this terrible disaster, and to close their purse strings to such an extent that it has been almost impossible to raise the necessary funds to sustain life.

What we want is, that our own people should respond to our cry for assistance in such a liberal manner as to put us on our feet, enable us to start life afresh, and in the future occupy our old place at the head and front where you find all energetic Americans in foreign countries which they may have chosen as a home for a time. These families that are asking aid are of the best people of our country, and as stated by Dr. Francis E. Clark, who visited the stricken city shortly after the disaster, "Kingston for many a month to come will need all the help that the benevolent in all the world will be inclined to give."

Would THE CHRISTIAN HERALD kindly publish this appeal and act as treasurer for the fund? Yours truly,

GEO. E. STODDARD,
Agent of the committee for the relief of distressed Americans caused by the great Kingston disaster.

ENDURING WEALTH

I envy not
The wicked man when he succeeds
Nor want his gold by evil got
And cruel deeds.

Alas, upon
His wealth his only hope relies;
Then, like a shadow, it is gone—
And then he dies.

The righteous man,
Whose deeds are kind, and motives pure,
Has less, perhaps, but past life's span
Shall it endure.

What work I can
I do to get me honest gain;
But will not rob my fellow-man,
Nor honor stain.

I guard and hold
For God and man my goods in store,
And thus shall use and still have gold Forevermore.

IN THE PUBLIC EYE

JUDGE K. M. LANDIS is probably the most talked-of jurist in the country at the present time, on account of his decision in regard to the Standard Oil Company of Indiana. The company, it was charged, had accepted rebates. The case against the company was first tried on March 4, and all the evidence was not in until over a month later. The decision, with its extraordinary penalty has but recently been made public.

Judge Landis declared against the company, and fined it the sum of $29,240,000. The indictment at the beginning of the trial contained 1,903 counts; 443 of these, however, were withdrawn during the progress of the trial. Each count dealt with the movement of a single car of oil over the Chicago & Alton Railway, and the Judge decided that the defendant's property was transported at rates less than those named in the carrier's tariff. The case will undoubtedly be appealed to some higher court. The judge said that while the nominal defendant was the Indiana company, the real defendant was the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, whose capital amounts to one hundred million dollars.

Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis

Judge Landis himself is a striking looking man, who appears more like a student or a college professor than a jurist. He was born in Millville, O., in 1866, and was educated in the public schools of Logansport, Ind., and at the Union College of Law. He was admitted to the bar in 1891. He has practised since then in Chicago, with the exception of two years, when he was private secretary to Secretary of State Gresham. He has been Judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois since March 28, 1905.

DISTRUST OF GOD

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE history of the children of Israel brings out the wonderful forbearance, patience, and love of God, and at the same time the continual distrust of God on Israel's part, and consequent disobedience. Distrust begets disobedience. Does it not seem strange that when they arrived at Kadesh Barnea, on the very frontiers of Canaan, every one of them suggested sending spies to search out the land? Are they so very unlike us? Has it not happened, again and again, that, when the Word of God has shown us the path of faith and obedience, we have fallen back on our own resources, and failed to give God the chance to make our way for us?

When the people's reliance upon God was not equal to the occasion, both God and Moses suffered the manners of the people in the wilderness (Acts 13: 18), and spies were chosen out of every tribe. Two of them only, Joshua and Caleb, really knew God. How solemn it is to think that if they had trusted and obeyed their God, they might have entered into the land direct from Kadesh Barnea, and all the weary forty years' wandering in the wilderness might have been spared them! Might not our Lord Jesus have come again to take his own to himself, without dying, in the lifetime of the apostles Paul and John, who were looking for him, if the Church had not fallen into the backslidings and sins mentioned in Rev. 2, 3?

What were the special causes of their failure? 1. They depended on man rather than God (Num. 10: 31). 2. They murmured and complained of God's ways (Num. 11: 1). 3. They craved other things which God withheld from them (vers. 4, 5) lusting after other food, though their health was such that there was not one sick person among their tribes (Ps. 105: 37). 4. They were dissatisfied with God's provision of the manna (ver. 6). 5. Miriam and Aaron spoke against Moses, whom God had sent before them, and he asked them, "Are ye not afraid to speak against my servant, against Moses?" (12: 1, 6, 7). 6. In inquiring spies (13: 1, 27). 7. Counting up the difficulties instead of trusting God (13: 28-33). 8. Presumption (14: 40-45); besides the repeated previous murmurings of Exod. 14: 11, 12; 15: 24; 16: 2, 3, 20, 29; 17: 2, 4; 22. Have we never fairly studied the reasons why our Lord is not yet come? Whether the delay is really on his part or on ours?

The spies went forward to search the land. Ten of them saw the land with their own human eyes as desirable, but unattainable; two of them saw the land as the promised heritage of God's people, with his pledged word to give it them, and they saw the land in the light of God's promises and of his faithfulness. Is it any wonder that the reports differed? All the twelve agreed that the land was "a good land, flowing with milk and honey"; but the ten (alas! the majority)—who, in spite of all the great things which God had done for them, measured every difficulty with their own human resources—brought a most discouraging account of the difficulties in the way: the cities were walled and very strong; the inhabitants were all men of great stature; they saw giants among them; they were themselves as grasshoppers before such men. How could they overcome them? And thus they spread an evil report of the land which they had spied.

But the minority, the two faithful spies, counting upon the unchangeable faithfulness of God, saw with quite other eyes. "Let us go up at once and possess it," they said; "for we are well able to overcome it." With the Almighty God on our side, we are infinitely stronger than they. And yet the unbelieving people believed the unbelieving spies. The distrust of God in their breasts responded to the distrust of the spies; and, as though all his past faithfulness counted for nothing, and as though his present word was an uncertain hope, the people who ought to have been overwhelmed with gratitude to God, lifted up their voice and wept; murmured against Moses and Aaron; pitied themselves, and said, "Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt!" or, "Would God that we had died in this wilderness!" Again and again they had spoken in this strain. It was once too often. God took them at their word, and every one of them, except Joshua and Caleb, did die in the wilderness. God answers prayer—even sometimes in judgment.

THE MARCH OF THE MOORS

Questions and Answers

J. H. C., Tiptop, Tenn. Who are the two witnesses mentioned in Rev. 11?

Dr. Seiss, who spent many years in the study of that extraordinary book, held that the witnesses would be Elijah and Enoch, who would be sent specially from heaven for the purpose. He supports his view in an argument too long and complicated for reproduction here. Other expositors have held that the witnesses were the Old and the New Testaments; others, that they were the law and the Gospel; others, Moses and Aaron, or Caleb and Joshua. No one can say authoritatively.

H. P., Ruthen, Wales. It has been said that natural light is the only pure thing on earth. Is that true?

No; light makes a good illustration of an object pure in itself, but there are many substances found in a state of purity, and without having been subjected to any human processes. For example, gold and other metals are often found in an absolutely pure state, though of course not in large quantities.

R. A. A., Woodbury, N. J. Were Christ's words about giving, non-resistance, etc. (Matt. 5:38-42; 6:25-34), to be understood literally?

We believe that as in Christ's teachings on other matters, so here, he is inculcating the spirit which should animate his followers, rather than giving concrete directions. He said to the lawyer, after relating the parable of the good Samaritan, "Go and do thou likewise" (Luke 10:37). He did not mean that he should go out and look for a wounded traveler whom he might succor, as did the Samaritan. The lawyer would have been very stupid if he supposed that in that way only could he obey Christ's commandment. He was to obey by having a helpful spirit, ready for all kinds of service. So in the Sermon on the Mount, Christ would have us exercise a generous spirit, a spirit of true helpfulness. It would not be wise or kind in all cases to give to him that asks, or lend to him that would borrow. True kindness considers the brother's case and helps him in the way he most needs. Christ concerns himself more with the spirit a man has, than with the amount he gives. If the spirit is right the deeds will follow.

T. W. P., Trenton, Ala. What are the names of the rulers of the various States in Africa?

Abyssinia, Emperor Menelik II.; Congo Free State, Leopold, King of the Belgians; Egypt, Khedive Abbas Pacha; Liberia, Arthur Barclay, President; Tunis, Bey El Hadi Pasha; Morocco, Sultan Muley Abdul Azziz; Zanzibar, Sultan Seyyid Ali. There are a great many small independent or semi-independent tribes who have some sort of a government. We doubt, however, if a list of the names of the chiefs has ever been compiled.

N. A. H., Hastings, Neb. What is the rest spoken of in Heb. 4:1-11?

The passage is part of the writer's argument, which was intended to show that the new dispensation was identical in principle with the old. It was an argument designed to disarm Jewish prejudices. He shows that the principles of sacrifice and of the high priesthood were the same. Here he shows that the offer of rest is continued and spiritualized. God rested, yet he "worketh hitherto." Joshua gave a rest, but it was only the believers who entered; the unbelievers failed. David proclaimed a rest, but that, too, was for the believer. The true, the genuine rest was that of Christ, as he said, "My peace I give unto you." It is the peace and rest of the soul which he alone can give and it finds its consummation in heaven. The chapter is a difficult one, and has had many different interpretations, but the above is the one most in harmony with the whole character of the epistle.

J. B. W., Germantown, Pa. What is the total invested brewery interest in Georgia, which will be affected by the recent victory of prohibition?

Some $2,000,000 are invested in Georgia breweries. They operate under charters granted by the State and will fight the law, claiming that they cannot be compelled to close before their charters expire. The loss to saloon-keepers and brewers together will amount to many millions. It is said that the railroads have offered to transport breweries and stills to other States free of charge, and most probably there will be an exodus of whisky interests into Florida and Alabama. The Prohibition bill was carried in the Senate by 37 votes to 7, and in the House 139 to 39. Of the 145 counties in the State 130 are under local option, and into these, "jug trains" were sent by the whiskey men of Atlanta, Macon, Augusta and Savannah.

G. D. T., Elroy, Wis. Is there anything in the Word of God which says that Christ was nailed to a tree?

See John 20:25 and Col. 2:14. Nailing was the customary manner of crucifixion.

Referring to a recent letter in THE MAIL-BAG, James L. Ingalske, Glens Falls, N. Y., writes:

"In your issue of the 24th ult. is an article 'Justice to the Millerites.' Miller lived and had a farm in, I think, the town of Hampton, Washington County, N. Y. My native place was Hartford, in that county, twelve miles east of here. I was born in 1832 and was twelve years of age when the second-advent excitement was at its height. Miller preached in our town several times and made a number of converts in our school district and town. One was H. M., whose children were schoolmates of mine. His son Henry visited me here somewhat more than a year ago and we recounted many of the incidents of those days. We spoke also of the large fires which were plainly visible at night on the mountains of West Fort Ann, eight miles northwest of our neighborhood, which we both saw and remembered, as we did the common reports of the time as to the ascension robes, the enthusiastic songs, shoutings, etc., and the giving away of valuable goods and possessions by the more sanguine believers.

W. S. P., Wesley, Ia. Can a person be a Christian without being a member of a church?

We can conceive circumstances in which he may. He may be in a heathen land or he may be confined to a sick-bed, or in some other circumstances in which it would be difficult, if not impossible, to become a member. But as a Christian anxious to obey Christ's commands, he will join a church as soon as he can. Christ required of his followers that they confess him before men, and the recognized mode of confession and the most effective is to connect with Christ's people. It is not the membership that saves, but it is an indication of a man being saved.

J. H. B., Redwood City, Calif. 1. Who is the greatest historian of the present day? 2. When and where born?

1. It is a hard question to answer, as it is a matter of personal opinion. Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, of Harvard University, and Prof. John Bach McMaster, of the University of Pennsylvania are among the first. 2. The former was born in Clarksville, Pa., in 1852; the latter in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1852.

Mrs. M. J. S., Eureka, Calif. When, where and by whom was the piece written, entitled, "Blest Be the Tie that Binds"?

"Blest Be the Tie" was written by Rev. John Fawcett, D.D. (1739-1817). He was invited to take the pastorate of a rich London church, but decided to remain with a poor country church, paying him only £25 a year. The hymn was an expression of his sentiments on the matter. He took a deep interest in missions, and was one of Carey's most enthusiastic supporters. He was converted by Whitefield.

C. H., Farmington, Wash. Is man a free moral agent?

He is free in the sense that he is responsible. Your own conscience tells you that it is open to you to do this or that. There are certain limits to your power, so that your freedom is curtailed to that extent. Again, there are limits due to your own propensities. These may be overcome by effort and by the grace of God. The drunkard is not free, being bound by the chain of his habit; but he may become free by the help of the Holy Spirit. No man will be able to plead at the judgment in excuse for his sin that he was not free to choose the good, nor that he could not follow it. God is ready to give him all the grace he needs.

A. B., Toledo, O. 1. On the bottom of the coat of arms of the State of Michigan is the word Tuebor. What does it mean? 2. Can you tell me when the division of the Bible in chapters and verses was first introduced and by whom it was made? I am under the impression that it was Robert Etienne, a Protestant book publisher of Paris.

1. Tuebor is the Latin for "I will defend." 2. The division into chapters has been ascribed by some writers to Lafranc, who was Archbishop of Canterbury in the time of William the Conqueror, a little after 1066 A.D. Others attribute it to Stephen Langton, who was Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Henry III. One of the most probable theories is that the arrangement was made by Cardinal Hugh of St. Cher and his "schoolmen" in 1240. He wrote remarks on all the Scriptures, and the Latin Bible published by him is supposed to be the first Bible divided into chapters as at present. In printed Bibles the division into verses is ascribed to Robert Etienne, 1545 A.D.

HERALD Reader, Calif. Is there any authority from Scripture for the belief that worms destroy or eat the flesh of the dead? Is it not a fact that they never do molest the bodies of the dead?

The general belief that worms do eat the body is frequently referred to in Scripture. See Isa. 51:8; Job 17:14; 21:26; 24:20; and other passages.

H. J. K., Toledo, O. Is the commerce of the United States, foreign and domestic, controlled by the government or by moneyed men?

The national government makes laws in regard to taxes upon imports from foreign countries and for the protection of shipping. Interstate commerce is also a matter of national regulation. The question is somewhat indefinite. Of course the government itself does not go into commercial pursuits; that is left to the merchants of the country.

Tiflis, Transcaucasian Russia. Scene of Recent Disorders

ST. PETERSBURG cablegrams state that July has been specially marked by Terrorist crimes throughout Russia. Over 300 civic and military officials, army officers and soldiers have lost their lives in encounters with riotous mobs, or at the hands of secret plotters, dynamiters, bomb-throwers and assassins. Tiflis has been a centre of disturbance. In this city lately a high Russian official was killed by secret attack, and several others of lesser importance have shared the same fate. Tiflis is half Russian, half Persian, and is the capital of Transcaucasia. Its population of 130,000 includes Russians, Persians, Armenians, Tartars, Greeks, Germans, Georgians, Jews and French.

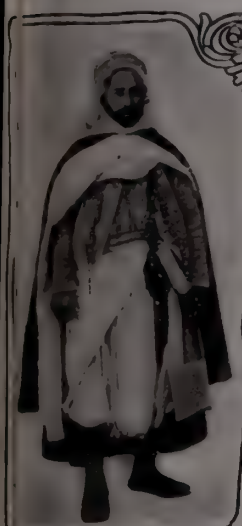
A Moorish Tribesman



French Officers Inspecting Native Troops

A Native of Casablanca

UPRISING OF THE MOORS

MOSLEM fanaticism, which has been growing stronger for several years in the northern States of Africa, has at last brought the tribesmen into open conflict with the European Powers. The seaport of Casablanca, on the coast of Morocco, was the scene of the first bloodshed. A number of French soldiers and sailors were killed by Moorish soldiers, and hundreds of Moorish horsemen were in turn mowed down by the melinite shells fired from the foreign fleet.

The French, who are masters of Algiers, have been in constant trouble on account of the long-continued disturbances in Morocco, the insurgents often crossing into their territory. After the international conference at Algeciras last year, the French, on account of their predominant interests, were placed in charge of the special force raised to keep the peace in Morocco. They were expected to keep the country quiet around the great cities on the seaboard. The main cause of all the trouble in Morocco, the Chief Raisuli was not worried by international conferences or international police. He kept making war on the forces of the Sultan, and though his fortunes varied, he seemed constantly to gain strength in the field. Recently he captured Kaid Sir Harry Maclean, and thus bereft the Sultan of his best general.

Maclean is an old Scotch soldier who has been in command of the Sultan's regular troops. What efficiency and discipline these warthy sons of the desert have attained they owe to Maclean's untiring zeal. He served in the British army as an officer in a regiment of fort. He was distinguished for courage and ability, and the Sultan induced him to come to Morocco. Sir Harry is said to enjoy excitement, and he has certainly had enough to satisfy the most adventurous since he took up his residence at the court in Tangier. He was knighted by the British sovereign in 1901. Since the Raid has been in captivity, discipline seems to have reigned and military affairs have been going badly.

For years the Moors of Morocco have been fighting among themselves, and while this condition lasted the Christians were comparatively safe, as no one party was strong enough in itself to attack them and still hold its own with its tribal enemies. Since the conference at Algeciras, however, the various factions seem to have been drawing together and forgetting their differences in their hatred of everything foreign and anti-Moslem. One reason the present Sultan has had to contend with such a formidable revolution has been the fact that he is a progressive ruler, greatly interested in modern inventions and modern ways of living. This seemed like sacrilege to a large number of his subjects, who are averse to change of any kind.

There are thousands of Christians who have made their homes in Morocco; there are ten thousand living in the city of Tangier. It is feared that the trouble at Casablanca will spread until there is a general uprising against the Christians and a "Holy War," as the Mohammedans call it, is proclaimed throughout northern Africa. If that happens no one can foresee the results.

The Ancient Moorish City of Fez, One of the Two Capitals of Morocco

Several weeks ago the tribesmen, thirsting for battle and plunder, their two main objects in life, began to gather in the villages built about Casablanca. They were evidently preparing to capture the city. The Europeans became alarmed, and through their consuls asked the Moorish commander for protection. He said he was unable to give it, and invited the French and Spanish naval commanders to land troops to protect the European residents. While these negotiations were going on some Moors fired their rifles at the consulates and at some Christians who were fleeing to the protection of the consular buildings. The situation at once became critical. Active hostilities between the Moors and the Europeans began on August 5. A detachment of marines was landed from the French cruisers Galilee and Du Chayla. The Spanish warship Don Alvaro de Bazin also landed a party. These were for the protection of the consular offices and residences.

No opposition was expected. The troops rowed ashore, jumped out in the surf, and formed on the beach; breaking into column, they entered the town. Suddenly several jets of flame spurted from the houses ahead, and as the reports rang, six of the marines in the front ranks fell. The leading officer, though badly wounded, ordered his men to fix bayonets, and with the bugles sounding the charge, the troops dashed forward into the mob of fanatics which was pushing in on them from the side streets. A fierce struggle ensued, the soldiers and Moors grappling hand to hand. With a great effort the French cleared the street and reached the consulate, leaving over a hundred and fifty Moors killed with the bayonet to mark the path over which the landing party had come.

Word of the attack was sent to the commander of the French fleet by a signalman on the wall of the consular compound. The ships steamed close in shore and opened a destructive fire on the villages outside of Casablanca, where thousands of insurgent tribesmen had taken up quarters. The villages and the Moorish sanctuary were utterly destroyed before nightfall. The Moors seemed to glory in the heavy fire, dashing about the beach in great squads and firing their long rifles towards the fleet. A large number of horsemen managed to make their way into the city from the rear, broke open the shops and dragged out the unfortunate occupants, and pillaged to their hearts' content, which to a Moor means to take all he can carry and destroy the rest. Shooting and hacking, the mobs swarmed about the town, and the people who had taken refuge within the walls of the consular building could hear the shouts of the men and the shrieks of the women. A party of tribesmen got into the minaret of a Turkish mosque and

CENSURE OR SYMPATHY

TEXT: Luke 19: 7

"He was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner."

TWO points of view, you observe, one of them simply broader than the other. It was true that he had gone in to lodge with a man who was a sinner. As they saw it, he had gone in to lodge with him because he liked that kind of man. As he saw it, he had gone in to lodge with him because he meant to change him from that kind of man. It is really a matter of the points of view of Jesus and the people, and what they see in Zaccheus. They were concerned with what Zaccheus himself was and what he had done. Jesus was concerned with what Zaccheus might become and what he might do. They were afraid to come too close to Zaccheus for fear of the effect he might have upon them. Jesus was willing to come as near to him as he could in hope of the effect he might have upon Zaccheus.

How to Treat a Bad Man

All the people said about Zaccheus was true. His own testimony later suggests that. At any rate, he was in a line of business that provoked the obloquy of his own race. He would naturally be resented. All that they said about him, remember, was true. The puzzling question was what they meant to do about it. And the fact was, they meant to do nothing about it. There was something more than they said or saw that was also true. Most of them doubtless would have been glad to see him turn from his errors and perhaps leave his business and become what they would call a saved man. Give them all credit for being glad of the words in the eighth verse, where Zaccheus says, "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I have wrongfully exacted aught from any man, I restore fourfold." I think Zaccheus means that he intends to do that. It is not an account of the life he had been living, otherwise Jesus' word that follows would not have been forceful, "To-day is salvation come to this house." A certain measure of change in Zaccheus is implied in that "to-day." If this had been the method of his life, then there was no special point in saying that salvation had now come. Supposing that at least to be a declaration of his new purpose, the question is whether their method of coming at him would ever have led him to make that new resolve; whether it was not Jesus' way of coming at Zaccheus that made him a changed man.

Their method was that of censure, his was that of sympathy. The two are not exclusive. The fact is that the method of sympathy leaves abundant room for censure. Indeed, in a certain sense it demands censure. It involves a plain acknowledgment of the fact that the life needs correcting, that there is something wrong that needs to be made good. The method of censure, on the other hand, is very apt to harden one, to close one's eyes to the good that may be in the man who is censured. Censure is a matter of law. Here is a plain requirement of justice, and there is man's misdeed. Measure the man by this law and he falls short. Well, sympathy is a movement of the Gospel. It does not pretend that the man measures up as he ought. It acknowledges his need for salvation. The marked difference is that the method of sympathy seeks to bring salvation, and the method of censure simply stands declaring the necessity for it.

The Scourge and the Cross

The trouble with sympathy is that it is so often weak and ineffective. It so often degenerates to simple blindness to evil conditions, and has not learned the language of blame. Only a little while ago I was asked whether I did not feel that we need now rather a Christ of the scourge of small cords than the Christ of the cross. The Christ of the scourge is the Christ of censure, of condemnation, of righteousness, and of flaming wrath over easily recognized evil. The Christ of the cross is thought of as in some measure a contrast to the Christ of the scourge. Here is love that seems to overlook the wickedness of men and provides salvation for them. Immediately I name them and describe them this way, you discover that they are by no means a contradiction. The Christ of the scourge is the Christ of the cross. The point is that the Christ of the cross is bearing the scourge upon himself. He is there because of his hatred of sin, exactly as Jesus went to Zaccheus' home, not because he approved Zaccheus, but because he did not approve him and wanted to make him the kind of man he could approve. He was able to see the beginning of a better life in Zaccheus, and he knew that the way to destroy the old life was not to strike it, but to encourage the new life.

Some of us parents have had our severe lessons at this point. We have seen our children in their nervous days perpetually doing the wrong thing—our mouths have shaped themselves into a negative until the muscles are wearied. Then there came to us a happy inspiration that the way to prevent the continuance of these wrong courses was to get a lad started with some enthusiasm on the right course. Adopting the method of sympathy, which lays hold upon something that is good and desirable in the will of the child, we find him led away from the things which we are bound to censure. If the sympathy of Jesus had meant his encouragement of Zaccheus in the things which the people censured, it would have been, of course, another matter. He managed it so that Zaccheus quite understood that Jesus had no sympathy with his evil, but that his sympathy lay with the better part of Zaccheus' life. And by the encouragement which the sympathy of Jesus gave to the better part, the old part was cast aside.

A Man Misunderstood

The people, meanwhile, had been striking hard at Zaccheus' sins. They knew him for an extortioner. They knew him to be stingy. They did not know that underneath his extortion there was a man who could be made honest. They did not know that under the selfish man there was a man who was ready to give half his goods to the poor if you could just touch the spring. They had pounded away at him until he was sore, so far as they were concerned. Now there came a gentler Hand which was yet very strong and firm, which quietly passed over the man's life, until it touched a spring which opened up a new department in his nature, a new love suddenly burst forth. It had been there all the time, but the people had not been able to recognize it, and Jesus by his magic sympathy had been able to bring it out.

I fear for the comparison unless it be reiterated that there is no encouragement here to sin. The sympathy of Jesus was no condemnation of the censure of the people. It was simply that he, taking up the fact which they censured, brought it into a new light. Granted that Zaccheus was a sinner, did that prove that a man should not go to lodge with him? They said, Yes; they supposed lodging with him would mean fellowship with him in his sin. Jesus said, "No, because lodging with him may arouse in him a desire for fellowship with my righteousness." No sympathy with the sin of Zaccheus—abundant sympathy with the possibilities of good that lie in him. No purpose to add any strength to his iniquity—every purpose to pour new strength into the better life that is there. Jesus will censure his wrong, but he will do it with the hope of arousing in him something that is better. The people will censure his wrong and stop at that. They have really no hope for him. They have abandoned him, and they hold only such relation with him as they must. He has been put out of their pale. That very fact brings him within the pale of Jesus.

The Sinner Sought

The only man whom Jesus ever sought out, so far as the account goes, was the man whom he had cured, and who, because of his devotion to his healer, had been cast out by the rulers of the synagogue. They had excommunicated him. He is the only man whom Jesus ever looked for. Let all of Jericho cast Zaccheus out; let them label him simply a sinner, and he is the man to whose house Jesus will invite himself. He will do that not as a protest against their action, but only to show how the Son of Man came to seek and to save the lost; exactly as the church to-day owes it to itself and its nature as a saving institution to seek and to save those whom society has abandoned. In some sense they are easier to reach than the others. Those whom so does not consider lost so that they need salvatio apt to be quite satisfied with themselves; but those w society has cast out are brought, in some sense, liarly within the reach of the saving Gospel.

Punishment or Reformation

But look at this whole matter in its application to or three departments. Take this splendid moral m ment in the country which is investigating the nati and corporate evils. Immediately the moveme stated, you find yourselves inclined to take one o other position, that of censure or that of sympathy. what do you approve in this—the laying bare of e or the correcting of them? In just what do you g in the whole thing—that wrongdoers are at last reve and shall go now whipped of justice, or that men have fallen into evil ways may have the evil reveale them? Have you a sneering opinion that all these knew perfectly well that the evil was going on—tha is no revelation to themselves? That is, are you of Jericho crowd? Are you ready to point to these and say they are simply outrageous sinners—let t be cast out? Or is there another position possible? we be as flamingly indignant with the evil as the Jeri crowd, and then can we take the position of Jesus an honest, manful and helpful desire to correct the and to recognize in the very men who are most respo ble for the evil a field of good traits which can developed? Are we required to admit that men whom and under whom a great system has develo which is itself immoral, have with open eyes and set purpose gone into immoral practices? Can we, al with our censure, find a place, not for a shadow sympathy with the misdeed, but for such a feeling will desire to correct the evil which is in a nation, to seek for better traits which underlie this surface t which has been discussed?

Criticizing Methods

See how it applies also in any great movement. movement of the church, such as the many summ tent and open-air campaigns—what is your own a tude toward them? Some things, let us say, you not quite like. Well, you can devote yourself to c sideration of those things. You can say, This hal this practice, is such that I cannot approve it. That you can censure the whole plan. Might it not be p sible for you to feel exactly as you feel, and to frankly that you do not like the methods, or you do believe in parading here and there, and yet to real that men who are leading that movement have a gr deal to say for themselves; that they go for the m part feeling their way toward the goal in which you freely believe? They are seeking to hold the cause Jesus Christ frankly and plainly before the city. Th has some large results whether we like it or not. we leave out of account the number of men w are reached in this way, who are beyond the reach of t ordinary institutions of the church, the number w hear the Gospel preached, who hear it almost for t first time, if we even leave out of account the w in which this closes the mouths of some men who c clare that the church has no interest in common life, shall still have to take into account the fact to whi the ministers of this city will testify: that in the f Christian work gets a much earlier and much m enthusiastic start than it does without the campaig There is not a paper which has not some reference religion in it, not a man who has not some reason f knowing at least that the church of Christ is still work. This summer movement creates and maintai an atmosphere, even if you speak as vaguely as th Censure is very easy. Sympathy is very much mo helpful and leaves room for all the censure that has be used, though it is pleasantly true that the man w goes with a full sympathy into the work is apt to fi his grounds for censure quickly removed, as was so Jericho that day when the censuring crowd found th under the influence of Jesus the cause for censure w removed.

I am more concerned, however, that we shall see th

THE GREAT TELEGRAPH STRIKE

NO event in the industrial world in recent years has attracted such widespread attention or affected so many diverse interests as the strike of the commercial telegraphers, which began n August 8. For a long time past, there has been hore or less friction between the members of the Com- ercial Telegraphers' Union (which includes a majority f the operators throughout the country), and the man- gement of the Western Union and Postal elegraph companies. Suddenly, matters came o a climax and in a most unexpected manner.

It came about in this way: In the Western Union office at Los Angeles, Calif., a union perator had been discharged in consequence of eports made against him by a non-union woman perator, who was employed as a strike-breaker. he division superintendent declared the man ncompetent and that he was deliberately delay- g the business of the office. The man's as- ciates, on the other hand, all say he is an xperienced operator and that he was discharged mply because he was active in union work. Whether the dismissal was justified or not is ot yet clear; but it fanned the smouldering mbers into flame. Sixty-five union operators Los Angeles immediately left their keys. hey were promptly replaced by non-union men, ut the latter soon encountered a new difficulty, or the union operators in Chicago and other ities, on learning of the situation at Los Angeles, losed their keys and declined to take any mes- ges from the non-union men over the wires.

Next day, the sympathetic strike spread ith electric rapidity. Over 1,500 operators eserted their keys in Chicago, and every our brought news of other cities joining the trike. Kansas City, Helena, Denver, Dallas, Gal- eston, El Paso, Fort Worth, Detroit and a host of maller places fell into line. The operators at the ostal Telegraph Company's offices at New Orleans nd Chicago joined in sympathy. In some cities, a umber of the men returned to their keys, but in a ajority of instances they had to be replaced by non- nion substitutes.

Meanwhile, the great telegraph offices of New York ere humming with business. The strike was still afar ff, and while sympathy was strong among the opera- ors, there had been something of a cleavage between he Eastern and Western branches of the Telegraphers' Union, and some of the leaders in the former were of he opinion that the Western men had acted precipi- ately. Besides, the Eastern men had had their own ocal troubles, but these were apparently in a fair way f adjustment. But the situation grew more ominous ourly.

On the following day, an incident occurred which roduced a most unexpected result. At the noon hour, n unknown man, standing in the main offices of the Western Union in New York, blew a sharp blast upon whistle. The operators, men and women, rose from heir tables in a body, breaking off all telegraphic com- munication, and left the building. There was no dis- rder. A number of the men marched to the Postal Telegraph building and to the Stock Exchange and the perators at these places also left their keys.

Accepting the inevitable, President Small of the Com- ercial Telegraphers' Union issued a formal notice that general strike of all the union operators in the coun- ry would be called on August 12, and the order would nclude stock brokers' operators and those in the employ of newspapers and press associations. At this time, the list of striking Western Union offices included, besides the cities already named, Milwaukee, Omaha, St. Paul, Nashville, Columbus, Sioux City, Ia., and Minneapolis. On the Postal Telegraph Company's lines the strike had begun at Birmingham, Ala.; Omaha, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Kansas City, Augusta, Ga.; Meridian, Miss.; Sioux City, Ia.; Memphis, Galveston and Nashville.

Girl Strikers on Picket Duty in New York

Many of the large Western cities were now practically without other telegraphic communications than those furnished by leased wires. Still, the real strike did not materially affect localities east of Cleveland, although the unrest among the union men was unquestionably growing.

At No. 56 Pine Street, New York, the headquarters of the union telegraphers, there was hopeful talk of conservative measures. The cooler heads deprecated a general strike. Ninety per cent. of the operators in New York, it is claimed, are union men. Formal demands to be made on the two companies were discussed. These included a demand for an eight-hour day, a 15-per-cent. advance in wages, the furnishing of typewriters to employees, and the reinstatement of nine operators, discharged, it was said, for unionism. It was asserted by the men that President Clowry of the Western Union had failed to adhere to certain conditions in the agreement entered into between the company and Labor Commissioner Neill in June last. There was some talk also of an effort to be made to bring about a Federal investigation of the relations of the two great telegraph companies.

In Chicago, the union employees of the Postal Company also formulated their demands and submitted them to General-Superintendent Capel, requesting a reply in half an hour. No reply being received, the Postal Company's tables were soon deserted like those of the Western Union. Vice-President Adams of the Postal pronounced the local strike there unwarranted and without justification. His company had given consideration to all the demands of the men, even increasing the wage schedule 10 per cent. in March last.

President Clowry, of the Western Union, gave out a statement reciting the Los Angeles incident, and referring to the Western situation. It closed as follows:

"The Chicago operators have presented no grievances and the present movement is an attempt to enforce the 'closed shop' rule, which if successful would take control of the company's affairs out of its own hands. Such a condition is inimical to the confidential and responsible character of the company's relations to the United States Government and to the public.

The companies have called on the railways to assist in the forwarding of commercial messages, in accordance with their contracts. With this help, they believe they can handle all urgent business until the present crisis is over.

Vice-President Adams, of the Postal, in a published statement, points out that the strikes at various points "are illegal, from the union view, and contrary to the charters and by-laws of the unions, which call for the submission of the grievances and plans to the national organization and the approval of its officials."

At a meeting of over 1,000 operators, held in New York, it was decided to postpone the proposed declaration of a general strike until the matters at issue could be further considered. This arrangement was reached through the friendly intervention of the United States Commissioner of Labor, the National Civic Federation and the American Federation of Labor. Messrs. Neill, Easley and Gompers offered their services as mediators and went to Chicago to meet President Small of the National Telegraphers' Union, who was coming from San Francisco for that purpose. After discussion, President Small issued a general strike order "to all commercial telegraphers," and including press telegraphers and others. By this order, which was dated Chicago, August 15, they are directed to "cease work immediately." 23,000 operators had already gone out.

Both the telegraph companies stand firm. They pronounce the strike a failure, and say "All the vacancies that were caused by the strike are now satisfactorily filled with competent and reliable men." In some quarters there has been a disposition to appeal to President Roosevelt to adjust matters, but Federal interference is highly improbable. Meanwhile, the telegraph companies are working with short forces at all the affected points, regular communication with these cities being greatly impeded; but nearly all the important wires are being operated. It is said that the general strike now ordered may involve 40,000 men and women, as it would include affiliated organizations, in addition to the Telegraphers' Union.

THOUSANDS THRONG TO KESWICK

As at old all roads led to Rome, so now, seemingly, all roads in this region, and others from points afar, lead to Keswick, where on July 22 was begun the Thirty-third Annual Convention. Keswick had its rise in the early summer of 1874, when Pearsall Smith, an American interested in evangelistic work, began a series of meetings in Cambridge among the students of that famous university. Then came a six days' series of similar meetings at Broadlands Park, near Romsey, not far from Oxford, which was kindly granted for the purpose by the owner, Lord Mount-Temple, on the suggestion of some university men who had attended the Cambridge meeting. About one hundred were at the Broadlands assembly, which was followed by a ten days' meeting from August 29 to September 7, 1874, at Oxford. In June, 1875, a great ten days' assembly convened at Brighton, with an attendance of 8,000. Among those at the Oxford meeting was the Rev. Canon Harford-Battersby, Vicar of St. John's Church, Keswick, who was so profoundly impressed by its interest and spiritual uplift that he returned to his home fully resolved that his people and others should share in the blessing that had been his.

Canon D Harford-Battersby
Founder of the Movement

Taking counsel with his friend, Mr. Robert Wilson (who for many years was business manager of the movement), a call was issued, and in July, 1875, the first Keswick Convention was held, with about 600 attending. It has gone steadily on, increasing year by year in numbers and influence. Last year the attendance reached 10,000. The meetings are held the last week in July, in two tents, seating 4,500 and often holding 5,000. Over the main entrance of each tent and over the platform, in white letters on a red background, is the motto of the Convention, "All One in Christ Jesus," and from the three tent poles, on streamers, in red and white, reaching from left to right, "Love," "Joy," "Peace." To the right of the tent is Convention Lodge, where the business offices of the Convention are located. The programmes of yesterday and to-day show the general style of the meetings. Mr. Albert A. Head, a leading lawyer of Wimbledon, England, who is chairman of the convention trustees, acts as leader at most of the meetings in the Eskin Street tent. Those of the others, on Skiddaw Street, three blocks away, are led by prominent men in attendance. The music in the Eskin tent is under the direction of Mr. C. I. Clapperton, organist and choirmaster of All Souls' Church, Langham Place, London, who for several years has filled the post here. His choir numbers 150, mainly women. Thus far there has been little solo singing; in fact, only one, by Miss Frostand, of London, in a well-trained voice, sweet and strong, with organ accompaniment by Dr. Grattan Guinness.

The dominant personalities of the meetings, so far, have been H. Grattan Guinness, M.D., of London, and Rev. A. T. Pierson, D.D., of New York. Dr. Guinness is a most notable man in a convention like this, forceful, eloquent, appealing, persuasive, apt in illustration and graceful in gesture. Dr. Pierson is specially popular at Keswick, and his Bible readings fill the tent to overflowing and are greatly enjoyed by the throngs who gather there.

Our first and strongest impressions relate to the earnestness of the people and the charm of the music. Each one carries Bible, song-book, note-book and pen or pencil, which are freely used at the meetings. The music is grand and inspiring. Everybody sings. The leader has his singers well in hand, but the choir plays a minor p It is the people who sing, and the effect is thrilling.

Pitman Grove Camp Meetings

PITMAN GROVE camp meeting ground lies eight miles south of Philadelphia, on the Jersey side the Delaware River. Methodist camp meetings h been held in this grove two weeks every summer forty years or more.

The first meetings were held in canvas tents, and w popular from the very beginning. I remember, wl very young, that, with some others, I remained night in the grove in order to be there early the n morning. We paid fifty cents each for a night's lodgi in a great big tent. I sat up all night on a pla seat without any back, while or two officers patrolled on t outside, and occasionally look in to see that there was no dis der. How we obtained our me has entirely faded from my me ory, but I shall never forget t night. All I could think of w soldiers "tenting on the batt ground."

Two or three years later peo began putting up board shant in which they could sleep a cook their meals during the me ings. That was Pitman Gro thirty years ago. Now it is a lit city of beautiful cottages, 800 more, situated on avenues, bran ing out like the spokes of a whe from a great auditorium, built li a pavilion; while outside of t grove, all around it, are beauti residences and the business porti of the city. Now the camp me ing is held in three buildings, t Auditorium, the Temple, and t Tabernacle, while the camping done altogether in cottages.

Every year these meetings i crease in numbers, fervor, and i terest. Mrs. Lizzie Smith is t leader of the Temple meeting Last Sunday morning, after a powerful sermon preach by Bishop Stanford of the United Evangelical Church, crowd assembled before the speaker's stand, keeping tin with their feet to the hymn they sang. The closing Su day is called "Big Sunday," and tens of thousands atte on that day. On "Big Sunday" evening this year the must have been somewhere near 40,000 or 50,000, t auditorium being packed and all the streets around densely crowded. Mrs. A. E. C. Maskell.

fired down into the French consulate. A small cannon was mounted by the Europeans and the minaret was wrecked and the attackers killed or wounded.

A man who managed to escape unscathed said later: "The horrors that occurred in that part of the town which the French and Spanish rifles did not cover will never be told. I saw from the back of the consulate Jews being beaten and shot. I saw their houses emptied by the Arab-led rabble. I saw Moorish women dragged shrieking from their homes. People who know best decline to speak or think of the horrors of loot and rapine to which the town was subjected."

An American, Captain Cobb, who has lived in the town for years, refused to take refuge at the consulate. The French consul very generously sent the greater part of his own guard to Captain Cobb's house, only keeping two men for his own protection.

During the day tribesmen began to come in large numbers from the interior to re-enforce the plunderers, and hundreds of these were killed by shells fired by the warship whose duty it was to prevent re-enforcements from entering the town. Again and again the horsemen endeavored to sweep by the guns, but were always repulsed. Many, however, made their way in back from the shore.

When the shots began to drop into the town the Moroccan commander lost what little control he had over his troops. The Moorish soldiers grabbed their rifles and scuttled out of the danger zone. Most of them probably went over to the insurgents. Those in the batteries fired blank cartridges at the French warships. The fleet at once turned its guns on them, and the front walls of the batteries crumbled away in dust.

Kaid Sir Harry Maclean and his Moroccan Soldiers

The bombardment had its effect on the commander Mulai Amining, who sent to the French admiral a profound apology for the action of the Moors and asked that he be pardoned. The French admiral replied that he ha no authority to grant such a pardon, and ordered Mul to surrender himself and what men he had to the Frenc consul. It is said that Mulai previously had done wha he could, had manned the walls and stationed guards a the gates to prevent the entrance of the Moorish rebels but that he was helpless a soon as the bombardment be gan, and his good intention went for naught.

The news of the fighting a Casablanca spread rapidly, an the Mohammedans became furi ous. The tribes about Laraiche marched on the town, but th gates were closed and they re treated at a show of force. Th natives rose at Mazagan and French cruiser shelled the town There are many indications tha the fanatics of Alcazar and Fe are preparing to rise, and the French have ordered the Euro peans to come to Tangier.

The French press are urging their government to take vigo rous action and settle the trouble once for all. It is said that an expedition will be sent as far as Fez to break the spirit of revolt. French troops have been sent to the disturbed districts.

If France subdues the country, she will have to stay there to keep order, and another small State will be added to the territory of a larger, because it had rather live the life of a bygone age than become part of the twentieth century.

GREATEST OF WOMEN'S CLUBS

Miss Alice Williams
Founder of the Berlin Branch

A Nook in the Drawing Room of the London Lyceum Club

Madame Thayer
Originator of the Movement

By EVELYN CLARK MORGAN

THE Lyceum Club, "an association of the women of culture in all countries," is a conspicuous ature of Piccadilly—London's ublend. Four years ago, this woman's club invaded fashionable quarter of London, where, between yde Park Corner and Piccadilly Circus, men's clubs ound. Miss Constance Smedley, a well-known English novelist and a woman of great charm, founded this club, which already numbers three thousand members, and which is intended to spread to all lands. Women of any country, who are seriously interested in the pursuit of literature, journalism, art, music or science, and who have rendered distinguished public service, may be elected upon qualifications only and by introduction by two members. There are advisory boards through whose bureaux the work of members is brought before editors and publishers of literature, art and music. The library contains reference books and members' works, and in the "Silence Room" some hundred or more English publications as well as a number of foreign ones are available. For the promotion of sociability "Circles" for different countries have been formed, America, Wales, Germany, France, Italy, Australasia, Scotland, the Slavonic nations, South Africa, Spain and Sweden being already represented. A social advisory board arranges all social functions, of which, there are very many.

Mrs. John Hartness

There are some forty bedrooms in the Lyceum. Town and country members may have the use of them for a fortnight, and longer if the rooms are not otherwise engaged. Colonial and American members may stop for a month or two. As an American member I concluded to avail myself of my privileges. I now had an opportunity to see something of club life in England. I was not long in discovering that there were radical differences. In America, we often hold our meetings in private houses, hotels, or public halls. The members, who are seldom women of fashion, don their pretty gowns and go to the appointed place to hear or give a paper, transact the business of the organization, or attend a reception. Naturally, in such clubs, the idea of using them for a quiet hour, a refuge from the outside world, doesn't suggest itself. In England, a woman's club is conducted very much the same as a man's, and a club without a home is totally unknown. The Lyceum was formerly a man's clubhouse, and was turned over with all its furnishings to the new management.

While stopping there I saw to what practical uses the club was put. Its members dropped in in the simplest of costumes to await an appointment; rest after a round of calls or shopping; straighten out their correspondence; read the newspapers or latest magazines, and sip a cup of tea. The daily papers were there; convenient writing desks and deep-seated chairs. Luxurious lounges stood against the walls, and a waiter was always in attendance.

Drawing-room, "silence-room," library and dining-rooms were all handsomely appointed, and at the tea hour the drawing room and halls were thronged with guests, men and women, the latter often in charming costumes. The balconies, screened with palms and bordered with flowers, were favorite places, and one needed to come early or engage tables ahead if she would have her guests drink tea on the balconies overlooking Green Park.

During my stay of more than a month there was seldom a vacant room at the club. One English member told me her fortnight had expired, her room was needed and she must look for quarters elsewhere.

In the hall were posted each day announcements of all social and literary club features. There was so much going on in this line that one could only choose among the many delightful affairs. Lady Balfour is president of the Club and Lady Strachey, vice-president.

Miss Alice Williams, deputy vice-chair and also president of the Welsh Circle, started the Berlin Branch two years ago. It now numbers seven hundred members. Miss Williams has just leased a house in Paris, which will be opened in November next as the Paris Branch. There was some discussion as to whether the clubhouse should be in the Sorbonne or Madeleine district. The latter was decided upon and the property of Count de Gardes, 28 Rue de la Bienfaisance, was secured. The house has five reception-rooms, twelve sleeping rooms and a courtyard, which will be enclosed for a tea and dining room. The special charm of this old Parisian mansion lies in the interior decorations, in the insets of rare stained glass in its windows and in its exquisitely carved oak mantels and doors. The latter have long been the envy of the Musee de Cluny, but the Count de Gardes refused to part with them. The French Branch already numbers two hundred members.

Madame Thayer, a native of Louisiana, and president of the American Circle, is doing a great work for her American sisters in establishing scholarships for college women similar to the Rhodes scholarships for men. Apart from the important fact that women should not be excluded from the movement to unite the Anglo-Saxon races, Madame Thayer believes that women are needed to bring the movement to perfection. It is intended that the movement, once established, shall become reciprocal and that English women may be sent to America to enjoy the privileges of Johns Hopkins University and others of our universities, while our girls are seeing university life at Oxford, Cambridge and London. The cost of endowing a scholarship in perpetuity is $35,000. The Society of American Women in London has promised a two years' income to send a student from the District of Columbia, and the General Federation of Women's Clubs in America has agreed to found a scholarship in perpetuity. Madame Thayer will give a scholarship in perpetuity from her native State, and it is probable that the Louisiana Federation of Women's Clubs will found a second one. The house described by Longfellow as standing "somewhat back from the village street" was the home of Madame Thayer's grandmother, and the "old clock on the stairs" was one of her heirlooms.

Mrs. Wynne, wife of the U. S. Consul-General, is a member of the Lyceum. I had the pleasure of meeting her both at the club and in her own home, where her beautiful young daughter presided at the tea table. One of my neighbors at the club was Miss Lucy C. Bartlett, representative in Rome of the Howard Association, of London. Miss Bartlett is an American by birth. Soon after becoming associated with the Howard Society she made a tour of the principal cities of her native land to study sociological conditions with a view to establish probation courts in Italy. She found the Indianapolis method best suited to her purpose. Returning to Rome, she succeeded in interesting prominent Romans in the work. Signor Lucchini, member of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, and Signor Vennutelli were among those who gave valuable assistance in the difficult undertaking. The first step was to organize a Probation Society, then to inform the Roman magistrates of its existence and to secure their co-operation. They agreed to hand suitable cases over to the Society. The volunteers now attend court when a boy is on trial and afterwards receive him from the magistrate's hands, so while probation has not yet become a law, it is nevertheless an established fact in Italy. Boys set free conditionally and boys released from prison are left in their homes, but are visited and assisted by the Society. Incorrigible boys are placed

Straitened Justice

ALL thoughtful Americans who are removed from the narrow level of political partisanship, and whose highest desire is for the country's happiness and prosperity, must regard with something of regret the growing impression which has got abroad lately that the Washington authorities are vindictively carrying out a policy of indiscriminate persecution of corporations generally and of the great corporations in particular. For, right or wrong, justifiable or the reverse, it is undeniable that such an impression does prevail. We meet it everywhere—in the public prints, in business circles, and in all the places where men of affairs congregate.

To even assume the existence of such a spirit in the conduct of affairs at the nation's capital has seemed to us to be assuming the incredible. Our people have believed, and still believe, in the honorable and just attitude of those in authority toward all classes. As for the individual point of view of this or that official concerning corporations or great aggregations of wealth in corporate or single hands, it can hardly be of serious consequence. There are the laws, which cannot be strained, relaxed, or overridden to suit the personal whims or prejudices of any official, high or low. And behind all, there is the strong underlying national love of equal justice and fair play for all, which we are glad to say is characteristic of the American people.

"Righteousness exalteth a nation"—and a part of righteousness is justice. Yet we find our contemporaries charging that the high official influences which have been brought to bear of late upon the business of the country have been neither just nor righteous. They point to the fact that the continued attitude of hostility displayed in certain quarters in Washington toward the most important business interests of the country, has resulted in a general impairment of public confidence in even the most legitimate enterprises. The outcome has been a shrinkage of values, which has deprived many thousands of worthy people of a means of income from their legitimate investments.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has never stood as an apologist for law-breakers. If trusts, corporations or individuals are detected doing business in violation of law, they should be made to feel the consequences. But it is the guilty alone who should suffer and not the innocent. To punish thousands for the fault, real or imagined, of a few, is a crime in the name of law that outrivals the offense it was designed to correct. If guilt can be brought home to the real offender or offenders, let them bear the rod; but the meshes of the law were not meant to snare the innocent. For the fault of one man, or a group of men, a multitude, who had no part in their offenses, should not be made to suffer. When courts and high officials exert their authority vindictively, driving in the knife to the hilt reckless of consequences, they convert the law of the land into a means of persecution and oppression, when it should be corrective and repressive. Justice without wise discrimination may become malevolent injustice, whether the administrator be an attorney-general or a district judge. Unjust gain may find its parallel in unjust justice.

Let them remember the exhortation of the patriarch Abraham:

"That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked, that so the righteous should be as the wicked; that be far from thee."

The Unknown Tongues

ON another page of this issue will be found a valuable and thoughtful article on a manifestation that is now perplexing many churches. The author dwells forcibly on the need to which we called attention in our previous article, of the exercise of discrimination in judging of the phenomenon. Every Christian naturally shrinks from criticizing it, realizing that there is a possibility that it is the work of the Holy Spirit. But we have the right, and it is our duty, to examine it intelligently, and to test it by its effects. If it leads to results which are not in harmony with the truth, or if it produces a disposition opposed to what we are taught to expect from the influence of the Holy Spirit, we ought to beware of it, and discourage its exercise. It appears that in some cases it does so, leading to a censorious spirit, and to a vainglorious idea of superiority. This is not the work of the Holy Spirit, for that work always tends to humility and peace.

Still more difficult is it to believe that the Holy Spirit is using a person as a medium of communication when the utterances are incomprehensible, as is frequently the case. God is not the author of confusion, but of edification. No one is benefited by hearing shrieks and ravings which have no intelligible meaning. It is not so that God speaks to men. We are forced to believe that if he has a message for mankind he would send it in a form that they could understand, otherwise how could they hear and obey? On the whole, the problem which is puzzling many devout minds appears to belong to that category that perplexed the Jews of the apostolic age, and may well be dealt with as the old rabbi advised: "Refrain from these men and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught."

Notes of Menace

IN a recent address, on the occasion of the centennial celebration of the municipality of Cooperstown, N. Y., Bishop Potter made some observations on American social conditions which deserve to be remembered. On looking out toward the religious future of the nation he found "three notes of menace." First of these is the phenomenal growth of wealth and the growing love of pleasure. He contrasted our social condition with that of our forefathers, who struggled through many hardships and privations and whose temperate and simple ways were almost the reverse of those that now prevail in our social life. Life, with them, meant conscience and duty first, and the outcome was a race of God-fearing and law-abiding men and women who commanded the respect of the whole world. A second modern menace he held to be "godless knowledge," which, among a certain class, has done much to shatter or destroy the old spiritual beliefs, and has provided no satisfactory substitute. The third menace, he pointed out, was the growing spirit of caste, which in a civilized and nominally Christian land, he declared, was something to make all good people ashamed. Our well-to-do class hold themselves aloof from contaminating contact with the workers. The avenue disdains to mingle with the slums. Our professing Christians look down from their superior height on the sinners. Our nation despises the yellow, the red and the black man as an inferior creation.

That the good bishop speaks truly no one will deny. He pictures the average state of "civilized" society, not only here but in other lands, under similar conditions. Riches incline the heart to the love of pleasure and indulgence. Learning, unless consecrated by the divine wisdom, will be of little value to its possessor as a means of bringing him nearer to spiritual truth. The Christless heart, puffed up with pride and ignorance, like that of the Pharisee, will be filled with selfish intolerance. It is the old story of weak human nature asserting itself. All the moralizing in the world will not change it materially. It is only when we reach out for a clearer vision, and are filled with the divine love, that we begin to comprehend our true relationship and responsibilities and to appreciate the virtues of simple faith in God, self-denial, and love and sympathy for our fellow men.

A Necessary Accomplishment

IT would seem that there could be no more desirable study added to the courses in our schools than that of swimming. The vacation season is still several weeks from its end, yet the list of drowning accidents recorded every day in the papers is truly appalling. People who cannot swim go out in canoes and frail boats, and are apparently firm in the belief that nothing will happen to mar their enjoyment. When the boat capsizes they sink at once or in their frenzy drag down some one who is endeavoring to assist them.

A short time ago a bather was drowned at one of our beaches and the people on shore were accused of cowardice because they did not go out and save him. The fact was that not one of those present could swim a stroke and they would have added their own lives to the already long list, if they had ventured in a few feet.

There have been many heroic rescues this season by men and women, and boys and girls, who were fortunate enough to be able to swim well. The Carnegie medal goes every year to some one who has plunged into the depths to help some unfortunate who was going down for the last time.

Parents who object to their children's learning to swim take a heavy responsibility. They should see that they receive instruction in proper places and und proper instructors. It is a simple thing to master, b may mean the saving of many lives if generally taught

The Telegraph Strike

SOMEWHERE between 20,000 and 30,000 telegraphe have "gone out," some in anticipation of, ar others in obedience to, the general strike order of the union president.

There are no vital issues at stake between the cor panies and the men, if we except the one much-disputc point of union recognition. There is nothing to stand the way of arbitration; but to be effective, it should n be delayed. Public convenience should not be made suffer unnecessarily, and besides, delays will not benef the cause of the strikers, but rather weaken it. The as well as the companies, owe a duty to the publi whose servants they are.

It would seem that, in a sense, the strike was not pre meditated, but rather precipitated by a single incider in the West. That, with the shrill blast of an unknow whistler in New York, undid all the efforts that wer being made looking to conciliation. Let us hope the peace negotiations will soon be opened, and that the key will soon be clicking merrily again, with every man an woman back at work.

Among the Workers

—REV. JAMES K. GRANT has been for thirty-seven years Canadia Presbyterian missionary to the East Indians in Trinidad, B. W. I with his station at San Fernando. He is now on furlough for th first time in many years.

—DR. F. B. MEYER, of London, struck the keynote of the North field Conference in a plea for more evangelism in the Church, an this note will be more fully carried out in the sub-conference o Pastoral Evangelism.

—THE MOODY INSTITUTE, Chicago, has now attained its majority September 10, its birthday, when the annual meeting will be held, will be marked by special addresses and the graduation o thirty-one students, a number of whom are going to the foreig mission field.

—REV. LEOPOLD COHN, superintendent of the Williamsburg and Brownsville Missions to Jews, 620a Quincy Street, Brooklyn, N.Y. writes: "There is much suffering among the poor Jews in my field of labor this summer. About forty patients a day are coming to our dispensary in the Williamsburg Mission."

—J. B. MITCHELL of McClure, O., has just finished his twelfth year of mission work in the mountains of Tennessee and North Carolina. In addition to preaching and teaching, he distributed much religious literature and helped many poor families with supplies sent by friends interested in this great home missionary movement. He found the people eager to be instructed, many coming for miles over the mountains in order to secure a Bible. In fact, Mr. Mitchell is unable to get enough Testaments and Bibles to fill the demand made upon him. "The hope of the mountain country," he says, "is in its bright young people."

An Experiment in Flying

FRANCE continues prominent among the nations in the attempt to overcome the difficulties of aerial navigation. The famous dirigible balloon Patrie made an ascent recently from Chalais-Meudon headed straight for Paris. On its arrival it circled and the Eiffel Tower, sailed over the Palais-Bourbon, Ministry of War, and the Elysee Palace, and performed various evolutions in midair which proved its marvelous stability and the control of its steering power. No accident occurred to a pipe in its apparatus, but repairs were made without descending, and during the forty minutes they occupied, the balloon remained stationary. Finally the balloon returned to the place from which it started and descended gently to the earth. The Premier M. Clemenceau and the Minister of War, General Picquart, were in the car during the journey and expressed their delight with the success of the balloon. It is considered the most perfect air-ship yet produced, as it maintained its elevation of one thousand feet and was manœuvred with absolute accuracy. The experiment has given confidence to the Government in the possibility of utilizing the air-ship as a military adjunct and a large sum has been voted for the construction of several of the same pattern. This, in spite of the fact that both in Germany and in England greater confidence is placed in the flying machine, which dispenses with the gas bag. The people nations are in a race for success in the construction of the perfect machine, and it is significant that in each the use that can be made of it in war is the chief feature discussed. In spite of the Peace Congress and of the protestations of peaceful desires, the nations show an inconsistent eagerness to possess the machine that will effect the greatest destruction and give the army using it the best powers of observation. How encouraging to the lovers of peace would it be if, as in America, the object sought were the advancement of discovery, which Mr. Wellman sets before him in his Arctic journey by balloon.

Let us therefore follow after the things that make for peace and things wherewith one may edify another. (Rom. 14 : 19.)

French Statesmen in their Journey to Paris by the Balloon, the "Patrie"

An Adventuress in the Toils

An adventuress who has spent most of her life in this country has just begun to serve a sentence of fifteen years in an English prison. Her career here and in Europe has been so full of crime as to make it phenomenal. She was born of respectable and well-living parents in the west of England, about thirty years ago. At sixteen years of age she was already restless and wayward. She succeeded in getting on board a steamer bound for America. After a brief sojourn in Nebraska, she returned to New York, where her extraordinary beauty secured for her employment in a spectacular play then running at a crowded theatre. Her peculiar charm was the sweet innocence of her face, which imposed on all who noticed her; but she proved to be utterly destitute of a moral sense. She won the affection of a millionaire whom she promised to marry, but her passion for jewels and horses and carriages scared him away before the time set for her marriage arrived. A respectable young man fell in love with her and married her, and for a time she appeared to be content and desirous of living a quiet life. But respectability bored her and she returned to New York and became the centre of the most vicious set in the city. Her escapades involved her in difficulty with the police and she escaped to London. There she consorted with thieves, blackmailers, and crooks of other kinds. With some of them she planned the robbery of an express company and saved herself from arrest by a flight to Paris, carrying with her the spoils of the robbery. Her protestations of innocence and her remarkable beauty won the interest of an English lady famous for her philanthropic efforts in the reformation of the fallen. She behaved herself well for a time, but soon reverted to her former life. She married a man who took her to South America, where he had an appointment in Brazil. She ruined him and he committed suicide. Returning to London, she became acquainted with a wealthy man whom she almost murdered. Another plot to murder in which she was engaged, ended her criminal career for a time, for she was caught, convicted, and has been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. She might have been a happy wife and have made others happy, but she chose the evil and became a curse to the world, and is reaping the fruit of her sins.

I find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her. (Eccles. 7: 26.)

A Shark's Blunder

A singular spectacle was witnessed near Sag Harbor a few days ago. Several United States vessels were engaged in torpedo practice at the targets set up in Noyac Bay. The results were being watched carefully by a number of naval experts. The vessels were 3,500 yards from the targets and a record was being kept not only of the marksmanship, but of the speed of the missiles. One torpedo, traveling at the rate of thirty miles an hour, fell short of the target and the watchers noticed, as it struck the water, a huge bulk dart toward it. There was the glint of a big fin visible for a moment, which the watchers recognized as that of a large shark. Another instant and it had caught the torpedo with its huge jaws and a loud explosion ensued. Fragments of the shark were scattered in all directions and some of them fell into the net spread around the targets. The fish had evidently mistaken the torpedo for its prey and paid the penalty of its voracity. The destruction of the shark will not prevent other sharks coming to the same end in like circumstances, but human beings are better endowed. Yet even they are not deterred from rushing on destruction by the fate of men who have perished through their greed and cupidity.

Now these things were our examples, to the intent we should not lust after evil things, as they lusted. (I. Cor. 10 : 6.)

Why the Church Burned

A Boston journal tells a remarkable story of a series of disasters which have resulted in a valuable discovery. A church was built some time ago in a hilly district of Ohio. The question of fire insurance came up, but one of the richest members, who had given nearly one-half of the cost of the church, strenuously objected. He said: "This is the Lord's building and he will take care of it." His view was accepted and there was no insurance. In a few weeks the building was struck by lightning and totally destroyed. A new church was then built, the same member contributing one half the cost as before. This time there was a strenuous demand for insurance, but the liberal giver again objected, and promised that if that building was burned he would pay the entire cost of replacing it. The new church was burned by lightning within a year. The recurring disasters excited curiosity as to the cause. The liberal giver summoned experts and had a shaft sunk. Within a few days a rich vein of iron ore was discovered under the site of the twice destroyed church. The property was sold for many times the amount needed to buy a site in another locality and to build a new church. God does not interfere to prevent the operation of natural law, but he often, as in this instance, blesses in another way those who trust in him.

The Lord hath blessed his people: and that which is left is this great store. (II. Chron. 31: 10.)

An Enemy's Defense

Russia is about to try by court-martial Gen. Stoessel, who defended and finally surrendered Port Arthur during the late war. It is contended that he might have held out longer against Japan and perhaps eventually saved the fortress. Unexpected and valuable testimony in his defense is given by Major Tesunoda, who took part on the side of Japan in the negotiations for the surrender of Port Arthur and is now connected with the Japanese embassy in Paris. The Major was the first Japanese officer to enter the place. He declares that the Russian troops were completely exhausted with fatigue and privations and incapable of offering further resistance. The provisions, which consisted of biscuits, flour and canned meat, were of no use to the exhausted garrison. Gen. Stoessel, his defender adds, might have held out for a week or two longer, but the final result would have been simply a massacre. The General, he declares, deserves congratulations in the name of humanity for closing a heroic resistance with a wise surrender. It is unusual for a man to go to the defense of his foe, but in this case he was able to do so authoritatively, and it may be hoped it will prevent the Russian government making a scapegoat of a brave man.

Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you. (Matt. 5 : 44.)

Is Crime Insanity?

One of the most famous experts in the world on insanity is Dr. Forbes Winslow. He has recently given to the London correspondent of the New York Times an expression of his view on the startling wave of crime which is surging over the great cities of America. He says that such crimes are the result of the hot weather acting on natures suffering from hereditary moral taint. "Violent crimes of all kinds are twice as frequent when the weather is hot. The maximum number of suicides is committed in the months of June and July; the minimum in October and November. I have found that there is but a hair's breadth of difference between suicidal and homicidal mania. When a man is afflicted with suicidal mania it is a toss-up whether he kills himself or some one else. The same applies to the peculiar crimes committed in New York. Such crimes are unquestionably due to the hot weather. Furthermore, I do not believe that the men who commit them are responsible. Man may live irreproachably during normal weather conditions, but under the action of a hot, humid climate, the hereditary taint is aggravated and he is driven to crime." It will be a novel defense for a criminal in the courts to argue that the weather affected him, but no judge or jury is likely to entertain such a plea. The evil is in the man and he has cherished it, otherwise the heat would not make him a criminal. The time may come, however, when we shall realize, as the preacher declared, that crime of every description is a species of insanity.

To seek wisdom and the reason of things, and to know that wickedness is folly and that foolishness is madness. (Eccles. 7: 25.)

GABRIELLE

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

By Isabella Macfarlane

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but leaves a note on the fly leaf of a psalm-book explaining his plight. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. With her cousin Rosalie she attends the festival of the crowning of the Rosiere. While there, Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Rebuffed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Her father leaves. Gabrielle takes long walks through the forest to be alone with her grief. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle is secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart to the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She falls out, and the driver discovers he has had a Huguenot as a passenger. He runs to give the alarm. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured by a coast guard, who takes her to a convent. The nuns try to convert her. Late at night she wrenches the bars from her window and escapes to the shore. She finds a fisherman waiting with his boat. He rows her to the ship, and proves to be Captain Girard in disguise. He wishes to go with her, but she sends him back to his duty. He is arrested on his return and sent to the galleys, the king refusing to pardon him. In the galleys he is placed next to Louis Marquand, and they become firm friends, not knowing they are rivals for the love of Gabrielle.

CHAPTER XIII

A New Home

DAY was breaking over the city of La Rochelle and the Bay of Biscay, when the Lively Polly, in which David de Bonnefoy, with his family and a number of other refugees, had taken passage, weighed anchor, and began her voyage to Plymouth, England.

Gradually the beautiful "city by the sea" faded from their sight. The two massive forts of St. Nicholas and La Chaine, with the still taller tower of La Lanterne, held the view for a time. Then, in the touching language of another refugee" fleeing for conscience' sake, they "lost sight of the great towers and the town of La Rochelle, then of the isles of Ré and Oléron, saying Adieu to France."

The de Bonnefoys had been much perplexed and worried by Gabrielle's prolonged detention, and were amazed and interested by her recital of her adventures.

Jeanne and Marie laughed heartily at the idea of their tall and stately sister crawling out of the cask as it lay in the mud hole. And as for her escape from the convent, that was like some tale of the troubadours, or one of the folk-songs of Brittany.

The voyage was propitious. The vessel reached her port in due time.

Placing their families in comfortable lodgings in Plymouth, David and the other leaders of the little company went up to London, where already a large colony of Huguenots had settled, built churches, established manufactures, and in many cases become naturalized citizens. With some of these they consulted in regard to their emigrating to the "Province of New York."

David had written to his kinsman, Roger Bonnefoy, in relation to this matter, asking to know in what locality he had settled, and informing him of his own intention of joining him in the New World.

Correspondence was slow and uncertain in those times, but after long delay there came to him the following letter:

"Dear Cousin David: I am delighted with your project of coming to America. I found a refuge at first, as you know, in St. Christopher, but meeting with a ship-captain sailing to New York, I took passage with him. When I reached here I looked around the country a little, and having found a cove with a great rocky point jutting out into the waters of a narrow inland sea called Long Island Sound, which so much resembled the port of our dear La Rochelle and the rock from which it derives its name, with the pretty islands lying in front of it, like Ré and Oléron, I was at once attracted to it, and resolved to settle there. Having purchased a small farm, I built me a house of boards (which is the fashion of this country), and here I dwell with my wife Susanne and my two children. And here I am ready to entertain you and yours, dear cousin. It is a fine country, and I am very happy. My only difficulty is with the language, which is a jumble of Dutch and English, hard to understand. Then the people have some queer ways. In greeting you, for instance, they do not simply raise the hat from the head as with us—they grasp your hand, and shake it up and down like a pump-handle. But after a while, one gets used to such things.

"Your cousin,

"Roger Bonnefoy."

The receipt of this letter had given David great encouragement, which was confirmed by his conferences with the English refugees, some of whom, originally from La Rochelle, elected to accompany him and his friends.

Accordingly, a ship was laden with stores, provisions, tools, agricultural implements, seeds, and everything likely to be required in a new colony, together with two pieces of ordnance. On this vessel, the Dolphin, the colonists set sail from Plymouth, accompanied by the good wishes and fervent prayers of their compatriots in England.

The voyage was long and wearisome, occupying no less than ten weeks, and encountering some severe storms, but happily meeting with none of those pirates against whom the pieces of ordnance that formed part of the vessel's outfit were intended to be used.

But at length the beautiful bay of New York opened its wide arms to receive the colonists. Passing by the small city of ten or twelve thousand inhabitants perched on the extreme end of Manhattan Island, the vessel sailed up Cousin Roger's "inland sea" for about twenty miles, and landed her passengers on the rocky point which still bears the name of Bonnefoy's Point, and may well be called the Plymouth Rock of the Huguenots.

"'Do you see the ship, Gabrielle?' said the old pastor"

The colonists were received by Roger Bonnefoy with the heartiest of welcomes. With the effusive excitability of his nation, he embraced his relatives one by one, kissing them on the cheek, and shedding tears of joy, or exploding in bursts of laughter. There was no pump-handle greeting from Cousin Roger.

"Why, David, you look well! But there are gray hairs on your head that were not there when I saw you last. And here is Madame as serene and patient as ever, looking not a day older. And here, I declare, is old Grandmother de Bonnefoy, hale and hearty, and stepping lightly as a girl—"

"How dare you call me 'old,' you s fellow?" said the dame, feigning a "On the voyage they told me I was youngest of them all—and the gaye

At which sally, Cousin Roger's l rang out louder than ever, as the old stepped with a firm foot on the soi the New World.

"And this tall and beautiful y woman," continued the voluble R "who is she?"

"My daughter, Gabrielle," said Da presenting her.

"What! Surely this cannot be the Gabrielle, whom I used to dandle on knee and mount on my shoulder a years ago?"

"The same, Cousin Roger, and I recall to this day the thrill—half f half delight—with which I enjoyed t rides on your shoulder."

"But there was nothing to fear. never tumbled off, did you, ma cous Cousin Roger took care of that," another burst of laughter. "And t two young girls—they must be Jea and Marie. They were babies whe left. And Christine too, the fait Christine? The family group would be complete without Christine. But is this?" he added, as an emaciated feeble old man was assisted ashore by strong, kind arms of David. Roger grieved to learn that it was Pastor M quand, to whose eloquent preaching had often listened in the now demoli "temple" of La Rochelle.

Passing then among the other refug who were for the most part Rochell he recognized many old acquaintances.

"Ha! Pierre; you here? And y Stephen? And you, Alexander? frie of my boyhood, how glad I am to you again! And here is another who know—and another—and yet anoth Why, all La Rochelle seems to be he I propose that we build a city here, call it New Rochelle."

The proposal was received with ac mation, and the very idea of it seemed cheer the hearts of the forlorn and oce weary company, who, at the pres moment, had not where to lay th heads. The most important matt however, was to find present shelt leaving the building of cities to the futu

Roger Bonnefoy's house, the only in the place, was too small to accomm date any but his own immediate re tives, and even they, with his wife a two children, filled it to repletion. So put up tents of sailcloth obtained fr the ship—which material also was e ployed to cover the goods as they w landed. Others erected huts of ba with the assistance of the Indians, w hovered around in numbers, and show themselves quite friendly. Others, aga made temporary habitations by diggi pits, cellar-fashion, six or seven fe deep, cased, floored and roofed wi wood, and covered with sod. The cellar-houses formed very comfortab dwellings, in which the occupants liv dry and warm, until such time as th were able to build for themselves bett habitations.

Some of the refugees, like David Bonnefoy, had means. These soon o tained land, and erected for themselv some of those "good, handsome house of which Madam Knight, an English lad writing in her diary a few years late speaks as making New Rochelle very pretty place," in conjunction wit its natural beauties, and the "three fi taverns within call of each other."

MIDDLE-AGED WOMEN

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE middle-aged or elderly woman who finds herself deprived of a bread-winner by the death of her husband, son or brother, or from whom a comfortable income is for any reason unexpectedly removed, is in an unenviable position. Accustomed to comfort, if not to luxury, and possessed of no wage-earning skill, she confronts an indifferent and unfriendly world. Faced with the necessity of self-support, she comprehends for the first time that she has a terrible disadvantage, first, because of her increasing years, and second, through her lack of experience and knowledge.

The competition in every avenue is formidable. Thousands of young women, well equipped for service, are already in the field, and wherever the elderly gentlewoman applies, she discovers to her dismay that youth and health and sometimes beauty have been before her. Every door-way seems closed and barred. Candidly taking stock of herself, she is forced to the admission that she is mistress of no trade or profession, and that there is nothing to which she can turn with a certainty of success.

Not long ago a New York newspaper contained a touching letter from a woman of this special class, who closed her appeal by the question, "Is there any place on earth like for an impoverished and elderly aunt or cousin?"

There are, of course, numerous institutions known as Old Ladies' Homes, in which, on the payment of a stipulated sum, aged women may find an asylum during the evening of life. Many of these homes are very comfortable; are furnished with a view to the convenience of the inmates, and are conspicuously free from burdening and disagreeable internal regulations. Notwithstanding all this, they never attain to anything beyond a makeshift. They are substitutes for the real thing, and no elderly woman who can live her life out in the household of her kindred should be compelled to see the sands run out in a home that begins with a capital H.

The plight of the middle-aged woman not yet old enough to be regarded as a derelict, still strong and vigorous in mind and body, is more pitiable than that of one who is past three-score and ten. Half the time she does not know what she wants. Beyond the fact that she is in need and would like to get something to do, her ideas are exceedingly vague. She cannot be a stenographer or typist, a clerk or a saleswoman, a bookkeeper or a cashier. She has not the facility, the alertness, the address requisite in these occupations. It is useless for her to think of being a reporter, and though she might possibly nurse sick people quite efficiently, the trained nurse in the flower of her years has entry properly the monopoly of this form of activity. Frequently the middle-aged woman is too modest, too timid, and too lacking in initiative. She sits down in despair. Absolutely to her view there is not a single door open to self-support.

Yet she ought not to be so easily discouraged. If she has been a thorough housekeeper in her own home, she must understand the care of a linen closet, and must know how to cater for a family. In the smaller hotels she may assume the department of catering and oversee the domestic staff. In the larger, women like herself are employed in looking after the linen of the establishment, its laundering, marking and supplying to rooms and tables inclusive. Middle-aged women are in demand as mothers' helpers, as matrons in orphanages and prisons, as care-takers in various capacities, as house-mothers at women's colleges, occasionally as visiting housekeepers in cities, and in the time-honored position of housekeepers for aged folk in wealthy homes, and in the homes of widowers.

Considering the great number of middle-aged women from whom we are constantly hearing the bitter complaint that no one will hire them, it is singular to ascertain the great difficulty which employers nowadays often find in securing the right sort of help from this particular class at the right time and in the right place.

THE VILLAGE MENDER

Grandpa and Time have grown old together.
All day long in all sorts of weather,
From the clock that ticks in the old church steeple
To the little watches that serve good people,
Grandpa can mend whatever goes wrong.

And start it again in a merry song.
Dear little Gretchen, with eyes of blue,
Finds many wonderful things to do.
The world for her has a spotless page;
She's the one bright flower in the sight of Age.

While women are young, while the sun shines and the birds sing and the foot is light and the heart is gay, before the evil days come of anxiety, loneliness and poverty, preparation should be made for a day that may be dark and rainy. The provident person makes what pecuniary provision she can for the time of need.

Many women not improvident, not extravagant nor wasteful, never have the opportunity to save money. It is either not in their hands to save or they are compelled to live up to the limits of their income and cannot help themselves. They have never learned any art or trade that has a financial value, and if they ever had accomplishments of an ornamental character, these have grown rusty, and they are old-fashioned and decidedly behind the times.

It would be well worth while for every woman still young to acquire some deftness, some skill, some knowledge that she could turn to account profitably should an emergency arise.

The Breakfast Mood

Breakfast should be the cheeriest meal of the day. Everybody should come to breakfast with bright looks and pleasant words, and nobody should indulge a disposition to be grumpy, faultfinding and morose in the early part of the day. Whether one has slept well or ill, whether the prospects for the day's work are agreeable or the reverse, whether or not the food be to one's liking, the duty remains the same. At breakfast we start the day's schedule, children and grown people equally having before them definite duties and possible pleasures, and the breakfast table is the worst place we can select for selfishness and crabbedness. Unfortunately, there are people who never take much trouble to be decent at breakfast; they affirm that the machinery is not well under way until later in the morning, and they give short answers, snub their juniors and are generally ill to please at the morning meal.

Should the temptation to be cross assail any one at breakfast it should be resolutely resisted. Almost universally it would be non-existent if people rose a little earlier than they do and dressed with less haste and more deliberation. The plan of securing a little quiet time for thought and prayer before breakfast is a sure preventive of a morbid mood at that time. Whoever has communion with God before beginning the day will meet his fellow beings with a sweetness, a good cheer that are invincible. Too much hurry in breakfasting is noted where the man of the house must take a train and has given himself the minimum of time to swallow hot coffee, snatch a hasty morsel and make a sprint to the railway station. If only he could be induced to rise twenty minutes earlier he would be the gainer the entire day.

Children's Names

The school catalogues of thirty years ago showed lists of Lotties, Bettys, Maggies and Kitties, where to-day the same records ignore pet names and print in full the baptismal cognomens of pupils. A young girl entering a city school was asked by the principal what her name was and replied, "Carrie Lu." "Caroline Louise," corrected the teacher. The present custom tends to dignity, and even though it seems a pity to call little toddlers of two and three Elizabeth, Katharine, Dorothy and Margaret, still as they are fast growing up it is a comfort to remember that they will not after a while be called upon to protest against pet names. There is not a Lizzie of fifty to-day or a Kittie of the same age who would not infinitely prefer the distinction of her own stately name spoken and written in full.

In choosing a name for a child of either sex it is important to think of euphony and select a Christian name that will harmonize with the surname. The names of popular political and military heroes are naturally bestowed upon boys, as the names of favorite authors, queens, and kinswomen are given to little girls.

"THERE IS LIFE FOR A LOOK"

International Sunday School Lesson for September 8

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THIRTY EIGHT years have passed since the Israelites at Kadesh-barnea refused, despite the pleadings of Caleb and Joshua, to go up and possess the Promised Land. These have been years of disaster and sorrow and death. The hand of their God has been heavy upon them because of their murmuring and disobedience.

There has been rebellion in the camp, which God has punished, with earthquake and plague, by which fifteen thousand people have perished (Num. 16: 1-50). Through sickness and old age all who were above twenty years of age when they came out of Egypt except Joshua and Caleb died. And so the wilderness of Zin has become a vast cemetery. At the end of the thirty-eight years the host stands before God as a new Israel. How do they compare with their fathers? Moses has still continued as leader, while Aaron has been called up on the mountain to die, and upon his son have been put the golden clothes of the high priest. The host has marched forward, praying that God would deliver their enemies into their hands, even those in the walled cities, which their fathers had so greatly feared. And they have vowed unto the Lord to do their part faithfully if God will help them. In the very first battle God has been with them, and delivered the Canaanites into their hands, and the Israelites have destroyed their cities.

Jesus Appropriated the Event

So far the new Israel has been a gain upon old Israel. But the march since these victories has been through a desolate region "everywhere furrowed and torn with the beds of torrents," and infested with foes. The hearts of the new Israel have grown faint and they have fallen into the wicked ways of their fathers, and have murmured against Moses and against God, and wished themselves back in Egypt. They have even expressed loathing of the bread from heaven which God has every day given them. And God has punished them by sending serpents among them, whose bites have been as fire, and many of the people have died. The new Israel has confessed its sins to God and begged to be forgiven. And God, in his mercy, has told Moses to make a serpent of brass, and put it high upon a pole, so that all who shall obey the divine command to look upon it, shall be cured of the poisonous bites, and all who did so lived. We can measure the importance of this incident only when we remember that Jesus compared his death upon the cross as a means of saving men, with the brazen serpent set up in the wilderness. (See John 3: 14, 15.) No wonder the brazen serpent was preserved as a relic by the Israelites, but it is sad to relate that it became an object of idolatry to them, and was therefore destroyed after long years by the good King Hezekiah, who ordered it carried out of the temple and broken in pieces, exclaiming: "It is only a piece of brass!" (II. Kings 18: 4.)

Sin and Punishment

No history repeats itself so often in the Bible as that which underlies this lesson—the old story of sin and punishment, repentance and deliverance. "The soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way." This is a strange record to follow the great victories God had given them over many foes and manifold difficulties. Still more strange is their outspoken murmuring, that so quickly followed shouts of triumph and songs of praise. But, alas, all this is like human nature in every age. Such sinful tongues this story pictures as resembling the serpents whose stings set their bodies on fire. Sometimes it is pride that makes tongues offend. A little boy, three and a half years old, took up a book and pretended to read aloud to his aunt: "God says I am a very good little boy." His aunt said, "You are wrong, for God says you are a bad little boy." Some people are bad and don't know it, like the little girl who got the black off her gloves on her face, and went about the streets in this condition till some one kindly sent her to a mirror. The Bible is such a mirror to reveal our sins, in contrast to the perfect law of love, that we may have them washed away.

Unknown Peril

A friend of children, Mr. Josiah Spiers, from whose True Stories we have borrowed the two already given, also tells of a sleeping girl in great danger, with the house burning about her, who did not know her peril till a man rescued her at great suffering and injury to himself. So many young and old are, because of sin, in danger for this world and the next, and do not know it. Jesus their Saviour arouses them with the cry: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." Another story from the same source, and this, like the first, a sin of the tongue, is of a boy whose mother saw him standing suspiciously near her ripening gooseberries. She said, "What have you in your hand?" "Only stones, mamma." That night he was in great pain and could not sleep, and his little brother said: "I know why you can't sleep. It is because you stole the gooseberries and ate them." The boy learned the truth of David's words: "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper" (Ps. 37: 13.)

Prompt Punishment

In those Old Testament times, when the Israelites were but grown-up children and not yet capable of fully understanding the meaning of a future world, God taught them the doctrine of divine justice mostly by punishments in this world, which so swiftly followed the sin that none could mistake their meaning. To show them how sinful tongues looked to God he allowed the deadly serpents of the desert to bite them. At another time God pictured the loathsomeness of another sin of the tongue, Miriam's jealousy of her brother Moses, by turning her for a time into a leper. Both of these symbols of sin teach us that to God sin, even a wrong word, is no trifle, but a great offense, because it is a sin against a great and good God.

Lost in a Jungle

Affliction led them, as it has so many others, to repentance. "They cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses." A British sergeant tells how he was twice lost and twice saved. "When stationed in the Island of Ceylon, I went one day with a party of comrades on a shooting expedition. Suddenly I caught sight of a beautiful plumaged parrot, which I fancied I should like to try and shoot, so I left my comrades and followed the bright-winged creature as it flew from tree to tree. Never still sufficiently long to enable me to get a good shot at it, I determined to wait until I was sure of my prize, lest I should be chaffed by my comrades if I returned empty-handed. On I went, heedlessly following the enticing creature into the very heart of the jungle. Presently I thought I was near enough, and fired, but to my mortification, found I had missed. I tried to retrace my steps and rejoin my comrades, but after half an hour's walking, grew more and more puzzled as to the right way. I found several paths in the dense jungle, but they seemed to lead nowhere, being all too plainly elephant tracks, which I should rather have avoided than otherwise. At last I came to a halt, feeling desperately lonely and miserable. I knew I was lost in the jungle, and that darkness was rapidly creeping on. Soldier as I was, I had never spent a night in a wild jungle full of fierce beasts and reptiles, and I did not at all relish the idea. I sat down for the best part of an hour. NEW YORK'S NEW POSTMASTER

IRTY-FOUR years ago, Edward M. Morgan, then a bright young man of twenty-three, entered the government service in the New Postoffice as a letter carrier. By honest, faithl efficient service, and the strictest attention duties, he rose step by step in the ladder.

n carrier Mr. Morgan became watchman, then clerk, chief clerk, station superintendent, suendent of city delivery, and Assistant Postr. On August 14, 1907, the former letter carras officially notified of his appointment by ent Roosevelt as Postmaster of the city of New the most important and responsible position of d on this continent.

he many thousands of New York business men ave watched his career with more than ordinary st, Postmaster Morgan's appointment brings litprise. He has been the real head of the pracvork in the New York Postoffice for years past he last two postal administrations depended y on his executive skill and his wide practical ledge.

ay be truthfully said of the new city Postmaster here is not a single detail of the entire mail e, however insignificant, with which he is not ar, and he, probably more than any previous bent in recent years, is looked upon as a man ied by ability and experience to make the serat New York all that the business community he general public could desire.

A bond for $500,000 will be filed by the new Postr, who enters upon his official duties on September 1. He will adhere strictly the merit system in dealing with the army of employees under him and promotions be awarded according to faithful service and ability.

The appointment of Mr. Morgan as Postmaster of New York City was announced officially after he had lunched with President Roosevelt at Sagamore Hill, Oyster Bay, by special invitation.

A pleasing incident occurred in the Postoffice building on August 14, the day on which the news came of Mr. Morgan's appointment. Awaiting the new Postmaster in his office were several heads of departments. They had with them a floral ladder, which to those present was of historic interest. It was begun in 1883, when Mr. Morgan received his second promotion. As each promotion followed, a rung was added. The lower rung read "Letter Carrier" and the last rung on the top read: "Postmaster."

"This ladder is one of my proudest possessions," said Mr. Morgan. "Now I have reached the top; but I shall go right along as I have done. The only policy I know is the good of the service and its improvement in the interest of the public, whose servant I am."

Mr. Morgan is fifty-seven years old. He has served under four different Postmasters. His predecessors were Postmasters James, Pierson, Van Cott and Wilcox. He was Assistant Postmaster in the incumbency of Postmasters Van Cott and Wilcox.

He enjoys the unique distinction of being the only Postmaster New York has ever had who rose from the very bottom of the ladder. Most of the other Postmasters have been men appointed from civil life. Personally, Postmaster Morgan is a man of most agreeable manners and pleasing personality. He believes in encouragement and cheer for subordinates, and many a postal clerk and minor official has been helped in the arduous journey up the "ladder of success" hy his genial, helpful words.

CHAPTER XIV

The Old Huguenot Pastor

WHILE the colonists were thus prospering in worldly things, they did not neglect those spiritual matters for the exercise of which they had suffered expatriation. Though unable, for several years after their settlement, to erect a church, they were accustomed to hold services for prayer and singing from house to house, and on special occasions attended the French church in New York.

It was a happy day for them when they found themselves, by great effort and self-sacrifice, able to build a church in which to offer divine service in their own language, as in their old beautiful and beloved "temple" in La Rochelle, undisturbed by priest or soldier, unhindered by act or edict of tyranny.

But Pastor Marquand never preached from its pulpit.

Broken down by his own sufferings and privations, and still more by sorrow for his son, whose hard fate he never ceased remorsefully to reproach himself with, he became partially demented, and would wander up and down the beach, imagining that he was still lurking in the salt marshes of Poitou and Aunis, looking for the ship that never came.

At other times he would stray into the woods, searching for some cave in which to hide from the soldiers and coast guards.

Gabrielle devoted herself to him, partly for his own sake, but more for the sake of the lost Louis whom they both loved. It seemed to soothe the aching void in her heart to do what kind offices she could for Louis's father, and when, with the obstinacy of a demented person, he refused to obey anyone else, one word from her would calm him to the docility of a child. She would often sing to him from the precious book in which her lover's parting words were written, the sweet sacred songs which no harsh law interdicted now.

These would soothe him so much that he became almost sane. Then she would remind him, when he wept for his son, that in the world to come they should all meet again before the throne of God, where there is "no more death, neither sorrow nor crying," and where they all should be united with each other and with their Lord. It was a singular and a touching reversal of the regular order of things, that the child whom he had trained in religion should be the one to lead the teacher back to peace and comfort.

She constituted herself the companion of his walks, lest in his half-demented condition he should stray into danger, and often, as they paced the strand or sat on the beach, looking out on the glistening waters of Long Island Sound, he would say to her wistfully:

"Do you see the ship, Gabrielle? Is it coming, do you think? When it comes, I shall go home."

He had never felt at home in the new place and amid the strange surroundings, and seemed to have a constant desire to "go home." And in the confusion and bewilderment of his failing faculties, the ship he was looking for was no longer a ship to take him away from France, but one to carry him back to the beloved land.

A favorite resort of his was a spot on the east side of the Point. Thither he repaired daily, and turning his eyes towards France (or where he judged France to lie) would sing one of Clement Marot's Psalms, in a voice still so clear and sweet, though wavering, that the passers-by would one after another stop and join in the singing, until quite a little crowd had gathered. Then the pastor, imagining himself in church, would fall on his knees, and offer a fervent prayer—strange to say—in language as perfect and coherent as of old—as if, in communion with its Maker, the warped soul had recovered its poise.

But in the next minute, perhaps, his thoughts would wander again, and he would ask Gabrielle if she saw the ship coming.

And when at last he lay on his deathbed, surrounded by his friends and old parishioners, after having been for some time in a semi-conscious state, he suddenly opened his eyes, and cried:

"I see the ship now! It is coming swiftly! And Louis is on board of it—rowing, rowing—Adieu! friends, I am going—home!"

Yes! God had sent his ship—Death—to convey his faithful servant to his eternal home.

And when he was laid in the grave—his funeral attended by the whole community, augmented by many persons from the French church of New York, whose pastor conducted the services—there rested on his plain deal coffin an emblem wrought in evergreens—an emblem that drew tears from many eyes—bearing the words:

"I am going home."

It was the work of Gabrielle, her last act of kindness and devotion to the father of her lost lover.

Gabrielle missed the poor old gentleman. With his death, something had gone out of her life. But she was not one to mope, or to nurse and coddle her sorrow until she made an idol of it. On the contrary, each sorrow seemed to enlarge her heart and widen its sympathies, so that it took in all within her reach who needed her help. She was her father's right hand and counselor, her mother's tender nurse and comforter, the guide and preceptress of her two young sisters.

Withal, she soon became a leader in the society of the fast-growing colony. The fame of her beauty spread even to the city of New York, where she was always a welcome guest in the houses of the Huguenot aristocracy of the town. And even the Dutch-English young men were not slow to acknowledge her claim to the title of "The Flower of New Rochelle," as she came to be called.

Among those of the latter class who fell victims to her charms was Jacob Leisler, the younger son of the Governor of New York, who had become acquainted with her while transacting business for his father in the matter of the grant from the Pelham Manor.

Speaking in Unknown Tongues

How the Pentecostal Movement is Extending Throughout the Globe and What it Means

THIS Pentecostal Movement, so-called, which is spanning the globe, breaking out not only in Christian countries, but also in heathen lands, is demanding the attention of the thoughtful Christian, as perhaps no movement of recent modern times has done. For those who have not witnessed it in its working, a word of explanation or description will be welcome.

In a meeting during prayer or praise, the person, a Christian, often begins to shake, sometimes very severely, and then sinks into a semi-conscious or trance state. The person is usually prostrated, and while lying there he is sometimes quiet, or again full of praise to Jesus; or still again, the spirit seems to be groaning in intercession with what seems like great agony. Often the person breaks out in prophecy, or seems to be seeing visions of Jesus and heavenly things, and talks much of the coming of Christ.

The prostration continues usually for some time and often the person comes out of the trance speaking a foreign tongue idiomatically and fluently, or singing some heavenly music, when in the normal state he cannot sing, and always with lips full of praise to Jesus.

After having been in this state once, it seems to be an easy matter to fall into it again and still again. Noting such manifestations as above described and knowing well the people who are the actors, we cannot do otherwise than say it is of God, and one is filled with awe and wonder. And yet there is another side and one full of grave dangers.

These same individuals, after they have been "in the spirit" several times, frequently manifest a disposition quite different from the sweet spirituality of the first time or two. Their tone is harsh, they claim to have discernment of spirits, and that their utterances are none other than the voice of God, hence, infallible. Here, then, is the first great danger—infallibility. We need but to revert to the history of the church down through the ages to learn the fearful danger of this stupendous claim. Again, the harsh spirit of judging is contrary to the divine spirit of love. Under this head it may be remarked that in some cases these so-called infallible judgments are opinions or suspicions which the individual is known to have entertianed when under the control of the normal consciousness. In view of this fact, the question arises whether the enemy has not usurped control and made a tool of the suspicions and thoughts of the person's subjective consciousness, and so, under cover of infallibility, sown dissension and created discord; hence the secret of the jarring, harsh spirit. Again, there seems to be an undue prominence paid to manifestations. Indeed, many claim the Holy Spirit cannot come in his fulness without prostrations or visible, audible manifestations, hence they lose sight of the Giver in the gift. Again, another grave danger which perhaps might be classed under the above, is that it is claimed by many that none have received the Holy Spirit unless they speak in tongues. Thus, many who evidently possess other gifts of the Spirit are denounced as unyielding, and even, it must needs be, as very sinful, because they have not been baptized with the Holy Spirit, as is proven by the fact, they say, that they have not the tongues.

It will be seen that however beautiful and seemingly divine this work may be in some cases, yet it has many and much-to-be-dreaded dangers. The manifestations are certainly supernatural, and while many may find it difficult to account for them on any other ground than that of divine origin, yet they will find it equally difficult to account for other manifestations in the same individuals on any other ground than as the work of the enemy. It is hoped that this article may be of service to those seeing this movement for the first time, and that they may be prepared to "try the spirits whether they be of God." PILGRIM.

Greatest of Women's Clubs

in country homes instead of in reform schools. There are now ten boys on probation in Rome.

At a recent dinner I found myself beside Mrs. T. P. O'Connor, a woman of charming personality, who delighted me with reminiscences of Texas friends. Next to me sat Mrs. John Hartness, an American also, but now residing in London. Mrs. Hartness was Miss Minnie Harpster, of Cleveland. When a child, she was adopted by the 81st Ohio Regiment, and notwithstanding her long residence in England, the regiment has never been willing to erase the name of its daughter from its rolls.

The servants at the club were for the most part well drilled, but the cockney that prevailed among them was most amusing. The handle of my trunk needed repairing, and I heard the bell boy call over the 'phone: "Come to the Lyceum Club to get a box for a lody." There was a pause, and then "The 'andle's 'angin'." Our elevator boy, 'Arry, as the staff called him, found the front hall very attractive, and sometimes neglected his bell. One day I gave the lad some Dundee cake. He thanked me, and then, with an evident wish to do something for me, asked, "W'en you want the lift, lody, will you be ringin'?" "I probably shall," I replied, and 'Arry, all unconscious, went off to enjoy his cake.

Looking at club residence from every point of view, I found many advantages in it, and decided that in future visits to London I should always try to put up at the Lyceum. EVELYN CLARK MORGAN.

THY LOVE

THY love, dear Lord, I crave,
Thy blood my soul must save,
My sins remove.
Oh, wash them all away,
And let the light of day
Thy kindness prove.

In sorrow's darkest night,
While round faith's beacon light
Thick clouds increase,
Keep me from sinful fear;
Then in thy love appear,
And bring me peace.

Thy love is all I ask;
With it will every task
A pleasure be.
My love, my life I give
To thee, who now dost live,
But died for me.

Transcendent love was thine,
To give thy life for mine,
And die for all.
This love, dear Lord, I crave;
This love my soul must save;
I hear thy call:

"Come unto me, ye blest,
Come, and your souls shall rest;
In me abide.
Then shall your cry be stilled;
Your hearts with love be filled,
Be satisfied."

Georgia's Victory for Prohibition

PROBABLY never before in the history of the State of Georgia have there been enacted such scenes as followed the passing of the Prohibition bill, on the night of July 31. Thousands of men, women and children crowded the corridors and the grounds of the State Capitol, awaiting the passage of the bill. As the vote was begun, word went to the waiting watchers without, and preparations were made for a public celebration at the Grady monument, following the victory for temperance, which had long been regarded as a certainty. A few minutes before the vote was concluded, all was in readiness for the march of triumph. Mounted policemen were sent from headquarters to lead the crowd.

The State House, Atlanta, Ga.

In the time taken to verify the call of the roll, one of the representatives, an ardent prohibitionist, scratched down the vote of 139 and 39, and carried it out into the hall. Rev. Mr. Eakes was deputized to read it to the eager and expectant crowd.

In a voice loud enough to be heard by every one below, he read: "The bill is passed by a vote of 139 to 39. Praise the Lord!"

A shout arose that re-echoed and reverberated through the great building, reaching out over the city. Women hugged one another, strong men embraced, children waved branches of magnolia and laurel. Big boys, strong in the cause, blew horns and rung cow-bells. Pandemonium reigned in Atlanta.

"On to Grady's monument!" some one shouted. In a moment the cry was taken up by thousands of voices, "On to Grady! On to Grady!"

With Mrs. Mary Armour, the State President of the Woman's Temperance Union, in the lead, fifteen hundred members of the Temperance Union followed in the march, singing,

> This is the grandest victory
> That Georgia's ever won;
> So on to Grady's monument,
> And thank God for what he's done.

With this song, the great mass of humanity surged through the streets toward the monument of Grady, the man known and loved by the people of the South as "The National Pacificator"; but at this time he was honored and remembered as the "Champion for Temperance." Before fifteen thousand people he delivered an eloquent speech that carried prohibition in Georgia in 1887.

As the crowd moved on the big bell in the Second Baptist Church pealed forth, and the sound was caught up by the Presbyterian Churches, until it was echoed and re-echoed by every church bell throughout the city; the bells of all the negro churches joining in. The leading negroes of Georgia have been loyal workers for the cause of prohibition. They believe that intemperance has done much to retard the progress of their race.

At the Grady monument the crowd raised their voices in singing the doxology.

City Attorney James L. Mayon, president of the Anti-Saloon League of Atlanta, made the first speech. He was followed by Mrs. Mary Armour, Rev. Mr. Eakes, Will D. Upshaw, and others.

The crowd gave three cheers for Henry W. Grady; three cheers for Sam. P. Jones, and three cheers for the General Assembly which had enacted the bill into a law.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

WHEN WILL THE ANSWER COME?

WE have sown the seed in hopes and fears.
We have toiled and prayed mid falling tears,
We have waited long through passing years;
Oh, when will the answer come?

When our hearts have learned to know His will,
The lowliest service to fulfil,
Wholly to trust him and be still,
Oh, then will the answer come!

When his promises shall glow and shine,
Till our hearts are thrilled with a love divine,
And we pray, "Thy will be done, not mine,"
Oh, then will the answer come!

When our souls shall reach that sunny clime,
Where our faith mounts up to the heights sublime,
We may calmly rest. "In his own good time,"
Oh, then will the answer come!

Pittsfield, Me. MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

Constant Reader, Texas. "I always look for the Answered Prayer column first when I receive the HERALD: it has strengthened my faith."

W. C., Ohio. "I want to say that I know that God answers prayers. These 'Answered Prayers' have been such a source of comfort to me."

Mrs. J. G., Florida. "I want to testify to God's answering prayer. He has heard and answered my prayers so often, I could never think of doubting him."

E. K. D., Oklahoma. "I wish to tell to the whole world that God will answer our prayers. I have proved him to do all he promises, if we ask in faith, as he has taught us."

Reader, South Carolina. "I promised God, through prayer, if he would lift a burden off my mind, I would acknowledge it before the world. My prayer has indeed been answered."

A Mother, Connecticut. "I am glad to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer. For many years I have been praying for my son, who has recently decided for Christ."

A Reader, Pennsylvania. "I am a young Christian and wish to acknowledge that I already have received blessings from our dear Saviour. I write this believing it will strengthen some young Christian."

E. H. S., Connecticut. "I have promised my heavenly Father I would acknowledge my thankfulness for deliverance from an awful ordeal, and deliverance has come. God's name be praised evermore."

L. W., New York. "God has blessed me wonderfully and I promised to acknowledge it. If we but pray earnestly and believe, he will not fail to help us, and therefore I wish others would taste and see that he is good."

A. R. L., Indiana. "God does hear and answer prayer. A great calamity threatened: it seemed unavoidable, but, in answer to prayer, was averted. I praise and adore him for all he has been, is and I am certain will ever be to me."

Mrs. H. K., Idaho. "I wish you to print in your 'Answered Prayer' column, an answer to prayer I have had in the conversion of my husband. God does hear and answer prayer if we pray in faith and patiently wait for an answer."

F. M., Ohio. "I want to testify to God's goodness to me through a long and severe illness, for he has indeed been my comfort and stay through it all. I know the effectual, fervent prayer availeth much: the prayer that persists until an answer comes."

A Friend, Indiana. "The Answered Prayers column has been such a help to me that I want to be added to the list. I have received that for which I have asked, as has so often been the case, and I can say that I do believe that God hears and answers prayers in the way that is always best."

Mrs. M. A. R., Florida. "Orphaned in infancy, there came to a girl graduate, like an avalanche, the knowledge of a large debt with accumulated interest. She prayed that God would enable her to pay her parents' debts. Her prayer was answered."

M. L. B., New York. "The last year has been one of great trial to me, as I had to go through a serious operation. The dread was terrible, and I prayed for help and courage, and the dear Lord heard and helped me. My hope and trust was in him."

Mrs. L. H., Ohio. "I have so many times found God's promise true: 'Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver thee,' that I want to glorify him by acknowledging his great goodness to me in answering my prayers many times, when it seemed there was no help except in God. I am an old, old subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and hope I shall be able to see to read it as long as I live. I am now eighty-five years old."

Heart and Head Education*

WE are a garrulous people and too often forget, or do not know, that the heart as well as the head should receive its full share of culture. Much of our education has been that of the parrot; children's minds are too often crowded with rules and words. Education of the intellect has its place, but is injurious, unnatural, and unbalanced unless in addition to cultivating the memory and reason we educate the heart also in the truest sense. A well-balanced character should always be the object and aim of all education. A perfect system of education can never be attained, because education is preparing one for the environment expected, and conditions change with time and place. There is too much striving to be consistent rather than trying to be right. We must learn that what we call character is heredity and environment in combination, and heredity being only stored environment, our duty and our privilege is to make the stored environment of the best quality; in this way character is not only improved in the individual, but the desired qualities are added to heredity to have their influence in guiding the slightly but surely changed heredities of succeeding generations.

Cold mathematical intellect unaccompanied by a heart for the philosophic, idealistic and poetic side of nature is like a locomotive well made, but of no practical value without fire and steam; a good knowledge of language, history, geography, mathematics, chemistry, botany, astronomy, geology, etc., is of some importance, but far more so is the knowledge that all true success in life depends on integrity; that health, peace, happiness, and content, all come with heartily accepting and daily living by the "Golden Rule"; that dollars, though of great importance and value, do not necessarily make one wealthy; that a loving devotion to truth is a normal indication of physical and mental health; that hypocrisy and deceit are only forms of debility, mental imbecility and bodily disease, and that the knowledge and ability to perform useful, honest labor of any kind is of infinitely more importance and value than all the so-called "culture" of the schools, which too often turn out nervous, pedantic victims of unbalanced education, with plenty of words, but with no intuitive ability to grasp, digest, assimilate and make use of the environment which they are compelled each day to meet and to conquer or be conquered.

Price 75 cents.

A man's book, from title-page to finis, is Ernest McGaffey's Outdoors, introduced and explained by its sub-title, "A Book of the Woods, Fields and Marshlands." It is really a collection of breezy notes upon experiences which the author himself has had, and known how to enjoy to the full. Plover and woodcock shooting, bass and stillwater fishing, are so vividly lived in the telling that the reader hears the crack of a gun and the click of a reel as he follows the printed page. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Pp. 270. Price $1.25.

The intending tourist finds all his vexed questions solved for him in The Traveler's Handbook, which is a mine of information pertinent to the subject, compiled by Miss Josephine Tozier. The author attempts no descriptions and offers no advice. Her book is exactly what she claims for it—"A Manual for Trans-Atlantic Tourists." Every possible explanation bearing upon the planning of available funds for an extended European trip, information covering the ocean voyage, the handling of luggage, best methods of travel through each country, all are discussed with brevity and such accurate finality that the book is a treasure. Funk and Wagnalls Company, New York and London. Pp. 199. Price $1.

If more of the light tales with which the market is flooded contained the fine, wholesome lessons which Mrs. Emma Brooke has woven into her Sir Elyot of the Woods, the increase of ephemeral literature need not be deprecated. One surveys with reverence the majesty of the grand old forests of England, and the reiterated appeal of "Woodman, spare that tree" will find many echoes. A shallow woman's beauty loses all its influence when the man whose heart-strings are entwined about the oaks which shaded his ancestors, finds that she has sacrificed them to the axe in order to deck herself with their proceeds. The whole story is a noble one and worth reading. Duffield and Co., New York. Pp. 435. Price $1.50.

Song Service at Mont-Lawn

PROF. GRANT COLFAX TULLAR, the singing evangelist and well-known hymn writer, spent Sunday, August 11, at our Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, and conducted exercises for the children in his usual vigorous and inspiring fashion. Two services were held, one in the beautiful Children's Temple, at 2 o'clock, and the other at 4 o'clock, on the main lawn. A number of the townspeople were present to enjoy these services and to inspect the grounds and buildings. Dr. Klopsch was present with his usual happy greetings for the children and the visitors.

On Labor Day Mr. Tullar will come again to Mont-Lawn, at which time his associate, Mr. Isaac Meredith, also a well-known hymn writer and singer, will be present and take part in the music.

WHAT IT IS

Composition of the Famous Food

A wide spread interest has been created among good livers as to the composition of Grape-Nuts, the food that has become popular and famous the world over.

It has long been known to physicians, chemists and food experts, that the starchy portion of entire wheat and barley flours is transformed into a true and very choice sugar by the act of intestinal digestion in the human body. This sugar is identical with, and is known as grape-sugar, and it is in condition for immediate transformation into blood and the necessary structure from which the delicate netve centres are built up.

A food expert followed a line of experiments until he produced the food called Grape-Nuts, of which grape-sugar forms the principal part, and it is produced by following Nature's processes, in a mechanical way. That is, heat, moisture, and time are the methods employed and directed by scientific facts gained by research.

Grape-Nuts food is probably entitled to the claim of being the most perfectly adapted food for human needs in existence. Certain it is that the user's delight in the flavor and the perfect action of intestinal action during the use of Grape-Nuts is satisfying, and the added strength of body confirms the fact. "There's a reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

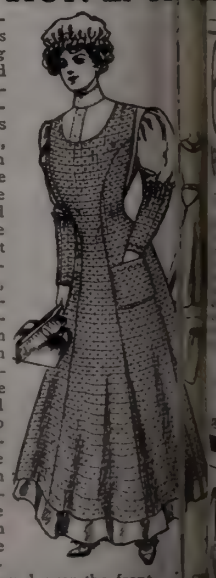
WORK-APRON With Ha and Du



Here is a most satisfactory Work Apron that is shapely and becoming while it is practical and serviceable. In the illustration it is made of percale but all the materials that are used for aprons, the Linen and Cotton Fabrics and also the thinner Lawns can be utilized, both White and Color being correct. The busy housewife will at once recognize the advantage of the Dust Cap, which is eminently simple yet perfectly protective. The skirt portion and the bib of the apron are made in one, the portions being joined and the fronts being extended over the shoulders to form the strap that buttons into place at the back. The skirt portion is generously full, meeting at the back, where it also is held by a button and button-hole. There are convenient and practical patch pockets arranged over the front. The Remedy for Sin

By Mrs. M. Baxter

THE journey of the children of Israel in the wilderness was full of trial. God's purpose in its various vicissitudes was, as he declared to them by Moses, "to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no." Their God would teach them a life of faith, in which they should see him as the first cause in every circumstance which occurred, and should cease to be discouraged by any difficulty which might arise. Sometimes their faith rose to the occasion, but too often they acted exactly as if they had no knowledge of an Almighty God, ignoring most completely his presence in their very midst, in the pillar of fire and of cloud.

"They journeyed from Mount Hor by the way of the Red Sea, to compass the land of Edom; and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way." What was the matter? Were there foes to be met? Was there another Red Sea to be crossed? Foes and seas had alike been conquered by Him who went before them. What, then, was the invincible difficulty which stood in their way? Must it be said? The people of God did not like what they had to eat! The lusts of the flesh were more unconquerable enemies than were the Canaanites. They spoke against the God who had delivered the Canaanites into their hand, and against Moses, and said, "Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? For there is no bread, neither is there any water; and our soul loatheth this light bread." Are there no believers now who are more really put out when the dinner is badly cooked than when no souls are won to Jesus, or when the power of God is not manifest in his children?

It was the third time the people had complained of the food with which God had provided them. They did so at Kibrothhattaavah (Num. 11: 4-34) in Kadesh (20: 3-5), and now again on the way to the Red Sea. In the first instance, the very food which they had desired brought a plague with it, and many of the people died. "He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul" (Ps. 106: 15). And thus, almost universally, when we in our perversity insist on having our own way, no good comes of it; it is not part of the plan of God for us, and evil follows. This third time, when they murmured about their food, "the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died."

The people, bad as they were, did believe that God's hand was in all that happened, and their first and only hope of relief was direct from him. "When he slew them, then they sought him; and they returned and inquired early after God" (Ps. 78: 34). They came to Moses and said: "We have sinned, for we have spoken against the Lord, and against thee; pray unto the Lord, that he may take away the serpents from us." Did Moses reproach them and tell them they had deserved their fearful punishment? No; the object was attained for which it had been sent; the people were brought to listen to and to seek their God instead of complaining and murmuring against him, "and Moses prayed for the people."

Then God directed Moses to make a fiery serpent and to put it on a pole: "and it shall come to pass that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live." Moses was not slow to obey the command of God; he lived too much in his presence to bear any malice against the people who never showed him any gratitude, but, on the contrary, murmured so often against him. And so it came to pass that when a bitten Israelite looked up and beheld the serpent of brass, he lived, and all trace of the serpent's bite was gone; the Lord had healed.

Van Camp's PORK AND BEANS

BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Best Food for Men, Women and Children

When hungry — think of a plate of Van Camp's steaming hot Baked Beans deliciously flavored with Tomato Sauce. Every delicious mouthful seems to go right to the spot and satisfy nature's craving as nothing else will.

For Beans are nature's choicest food. They contain the most digestible, warming qualities. When baked brown and whole in the Van Camp way, not a grain of this food value is lost.

Van Camps use only the most nutritious beans grown. Scientists say that the most nutritious beans contain over 60 per cent of sugar and starch and 25 per cent proteids, the tissue building element — that they are the most digestible food and the best food for cold weather.

The appetizing quality of Van Camp's comes not alone from the Beans, but also from the toothsome strip of lean and fat, sweet, young pork in every can; from the Tomato Sauce, different in the rich flavor Van Camp's chef knows how to give it, and from the careful baking — just long enough to bring out the full taste and flavor.

Altogether there isn't a better, more satisfying, or more appetizing meal for cold weather than Van Camp's — and it takes only 5 minutes to get them steaming hot and ready to put on the table any time. Van Camp's are always thoroughly baked — done to a turn — when you get them from your grocer.

Always keep a few cans in the house.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SOCIETIES

Divine Omnipresence*

OUR conception of God necessarily includes his omnipresence. Jonah fled to Tarshish to escape from the presence of God; but no modern thinker that believed in God at all would dream of doing such a thing. The old idea of his being one of many gods, which survived even to the time of the Psalmist Ps. 97: 9 , who conceived of him as merely greater than other gods, showed itself in the Greek and Roman mythologies, and exists still in Hinduism. The Christian, however, does not conceive of God as a Jupiter, reigning over a number of subordinate gods, but like the later prophets, as God, and "there is none else."

Theologians, dwelling on this subject, conceived of him as a being far away, who had created the universe, and winding it up like a clock, as it were, left it to go on its own course, guided and controlled by the natural laws that he had established. The idea of God as a supreme ruler, indifferent to the world and outside his own creation, was nearer to the truth, but still far from it. Men might reverence such a Being, serve him and fulfil his behests as far as they knew them, but they could not love him. Christ came with a fuller revelation. He revealed to the world the fatherhood of God. Men were his children, in whose lives God was interested, who was ready to help them in their struggle to reach a higher plane. They were not his subjects in a sense of being tyrannically governed. God was no capricious ruler, indifferent to suffering, sitting far away in sublime content, careless of the sorrows and miseries of his creatures. He was a father merciful and helpful, giving his strength to the weak, and sympathetic with the aspiring soul.

Still further, God was here, so Christ taught, among men, whose ear they could reach, manifesting himself to the humble soul and revealing himself to the childlike and the pure. It is difficult to conceive it, but this material world is an expression of him. He is so near to us that he is the source of the infinite energy that we call life. We speak of "nature" now, but as we learn more of him and his ways, we shall see that he is in nature and is everywhere operating in all its forms. As Jesus said, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." The divine immanence is more than omnipresence. God is truly everywhere, but he is more than that: he is in everything. We are surrounded by him, and as Paul said, "In him we live and move and have our being."

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society for September 8. Ps. 139: 1-12.

Receiving the Word*

CARE is always taken in the divine dealings with man, that his freedom of action is respected. God does not force men into his kingdom. He sends them the message of salvation, but the acceptance or rejection of it rests with themselves. It is that which makes the privilege of listening to the preaching of the Gospel so serious a matter. The exiles in Babylon must have found the most bitter drop of the cup they had to drink the reminder of their prophets, that the messengers of God had come to them early and late, but they had not listened and they had mocked, until the evil came and there was no remedy. They knew that it was so and that their condition was the result of their own action. Men know, in spite of the sophistries of the theologians, that the decision rests with themselves and the responsibility cannot be avoided.

Our Lord's parable of the Four Soils, or the Sower, as it is generally called, reminds us of four ways by which the Gospel offer may be met. In the first category are those who listen without attending. They act as if the affair was not any concern of theirs. It may be custom or social influence that draws them to church, but they leave without thinking of the message and the effect on them is of the slightest. Any gossip or frivolous conversation acts as the tread of the feet on the wayside and the seed that should have sunk into their souls is lost.

A second mode of receiving the Word is that of the impulsive man. He apparently accepts it with enthusiasm; accepts it almost too readily, not considering what it involves. When he finds his friends ridicule him; when he finds he must give up this or that amusement, he draws back. The Gospel is too precious a thing to be treated as if it were a mere fashion. It is a serious matter, transforming the life if it means anything, and when the impulsive man discovers that it is so he gives it up.

The third condition is that of a mind full of business cares and worldly considerations. The mind is too much occupied to give the offer proper consideration. All thought of it is choked by the weeds of the rank soil, and it is stifled.

It is the fourth soil that receives the Word as it should be received. It treasures the precious seed, the soul meditates on it, seeks the best way of preserving its life and obeying it, and brings forth fruit with patience.

CENSURE OR SYMPATHY

Jesus' method of saving the individual man is still the desirable method. Zaccheus is a man in your town. You will meet him wherever you go this summer. He is a man about whom hard things can be said, and they will be true.

I wish other young men in this day could be impressed as I was with the saying of Dr. Hitchcock, which I heard him roll out in one of those splendid sermons of his: "When a thoroughly bad man stands revealed, only lightning is logical." There is not enough lightning in our thought of sin. There are some of us who have grown so morally weak that when a thoroughly bad man is revealed, we want to treat him with a flood of beautiful sunlight. But Dr. Hitchcock was right—lightning is logical when you come into the presence of a thoroughly bad man. The question continues to be, however, what the lightning is intended to accomplish.

In my uncle's yard there used to stand a tree which had several dead branches. It was rather ungainly, and there had been a good deal of discussion about the wisdom of cutting off the branches and redeeming the tree. One night there was a severe thunderstorm, and there happened what I had never observed before. A lightning bolt struck the tree and damaged it in no wise, but tore off all the dead limbs. It was as though a thoughtful man had gone over the tree and cleared up the deadness, but left its life. Now, that does not often happen in nature. Is that the lightning which we honestly desire when we are dealing with a man who is evil? And is there no way of bringing our lives up alongside his life so that we shall bring out the better element that is in him, and, by that divine grace which is so ready for any man, let that better life eliminate the worse life which is there?

If we go out to the work of the world's salvation with our skirts so drawn about us that we are excluded from our fellows, we shall not win them. That is the method of censure. But there is something more to be said about men than that they are all miserable sinners. There is the possibility of sympathy which is Christlike, whereby we lay hold upon men who are sinners, and bring them out into men in whom God and their fellows rejoice. That is the method of Jesus with Zaccheus, bringing his own life so near that sin looked hateful, and the better nature of one who was already a child of the promise rose up and gained its rightful place of victory.

BAD DREAMS
Frequently Due to Coffee Drinking

One of the common symptoms of coffee poisoning is the bad dreams that spoil what should be restful sleep. A man who found the reason says:

"Formerly I was a slave to coffee. I was like a morphine fiend, could not sleep at night, would roll and toss in my bed and when I did get to sleep was disturbed by dreams and hobgoblins, would wake up with headaches and feel bad all day, so nervous I could not attend to my business. My writing looked like bird tracks, I had sour belchings from the stomach, indigestion, heartburn and palpitation of the heart, constipation, irregularity of the kidneys, etc.

"Indeed, I began to feel I had all the troubles that human flesh could suffer, but when a friend advised me to leave off coffee I felt as if he had insulted me. I could not bear the idea, it had such a hold on me and I refused to believe it the cause.

"But it turned out that no advice was ever given at a more needed time, for I finally consented to try Postum, and with the going of coffee and the coming of Postum all my troubles have gone and health has returned. I eat and sleep well now, nerves steadied down and I write a fair hand (as you can see), can attend to business again and rejoice that I am free from the monster coffee."

Ten day's trial of Postum in place of coffee will bring sound, restful, refreshing sleep. "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. Some physicians call it "a little health classic."

The rapid industrial growth of Trenton affords the most profitable real estate investment in the United States to-day. Trenton is one of the greatest industrial and manufacturing cities of the world.

THE CITY OF A THOUSAND INDUSTRIES INVITES YOU TO SHARE IN HER UNEQUALLED PROSPERITY

MORE than $40,000,000.00 is invested in Trenton's industries. They now employ over 25,000 people daily. Their payroll is over $1,000,000.00 a month.

In this busy hive are centered the most important industries in America. In 1906 the enormous potteries of Trenton produced over $12,000,000.00. Trenton's potteries are among the largest in the world, giving steady employment to over 5,000 people.

Another world-famed industry is the great Roebling Steel Wire and Cable Plant, covering 35 acres.

The greatest wire industry on earth.

The Roeblings built the great Brooklyn Bridge, Niagara Suspension Bridge and other great cable bridges of the world.

The Roebling plant gives employment to nearly 6,000 people, with a monthly payroll of $500,000.00.

The largest manufacturing plants in the whole United States are here. There are

A property sold on East State street about five years ago for $20,000 is now worth $75,000.

The recent transfer of a North Broad street property shows an increase in value from $12,000 to $50,000.

Two transfers on East State street show an increase of over 350 per cent. within the past five years.

These are only a few of the many cases that are quoted from official State records. All of these properties are within fifteen minutes of East Trenton Heights.

A Good Home or Investment

Acreage for miles beyond Trenton's city limits has increased many times within the past few years. Lots in this section have doubled within the past six months. The present low price of lots in East Trenton Heights is possible because we purchased manufactories, employing thousands of people, and we believe you will invest every dollar you can spare. There is nothing else like this at similar price in the United States.

Rapid Development and Special Advantages

Every purchaser is assured of successful development. All improvements, including streets, sidewalks, grading, even to the planting of shade trees, have been made by the Company without expense to property owners.

Lots are 25 x 100 feet and a few larger.

Prices are $55, $75, $85 and $95 now.

Terms: $1 weekly per lot.

Corner lots are $15 extra, sold only with two adjoining lots.

All lots are sold under permanent restrictions as a residence section, with no factory hundreds of industries producing everything from the famous Trenton water cracker to a ship's anchor, employing thousands of people at good wages.

This is the place for people who want steady work at big wages all the year around. We need help and lots of it.

Trenton's manufactories contribute to almost every important enterprise in the world. In bridge construction—great tunnel work—machinery of all kinds—tools—rubber goods—automobiles—engines—motors, and every device needed in the enormous engineering projects now under way in all parts of the world. The old manufacturing plants are expanding. New ones are rapidly going up because of Trenton's admirable location for manufactories. Its population is increasing enormously.

The city's growth is following the new industries—eastward along the Pennsylvania Railroad to

It is the place for men to live who want steady work at good pay.

Homes erected here will have the advantage of all modern and up-to-date city conveniences, with the best of schools and churches of all denominations.

this property at a great bargain before improvements and the trolley lines extended to it. We are selling lots to out-of-town people at prices that seem ridiculous to Trenton people, because we want to attract a great many good people to Trenton.

Plenty of Work—Good Pay

There is not another city in the United States like Trenton.

Trenton is the great eastern centre of population. There are now more than 8,000,000 people within a two-hours' ride of Trenton.

More than one-tenth the total population of the United States can get to Trenton in two hours.

Trenton has more money invested in manufactories than any city of its size in the United States.

There is a greater and wider demand here for all kinds of labor than anywhere else. People from all parts of the country are coming here every year. Expert mechanics and high-class artisans are brought here from Europe. If you are looking for work, come to Trenton. We need you here. Wages are good and living is low.

There is plenty of opportunity here for every ambitious person. Every time a new industry locates here they have to advertise in other cities for help. People here are busy and prosperous. The Banks and Savings Funds have on deposit a little over $330 for every man, woman and child in Trenton.

Think all of these facts over carefully—then think of the wonderful opportunity for real estate investment in East Trenton Heights, within a stone's throw of immense

SOME OPINIONS FROM PEOPLE AT HOME

CONTRACTOR AND BUILDER WANTS THREE BLOCKS

I have been watching development in East Trenton Heights with considerable interest, and believe you have one of the best residence sections for quick development in the city.

I believe your idea of selling at a low price to induce quick building is a good one.

The splendid location of the property is sure to make it very popular with people already in Trenton, and the hundreds coming here with the new industries.

My object in writing you is to be on the ground floor on building operations, which I feel will be large this season.

Can you give me an option on three blocks, one along Princeton avenue, one along Pennsylvania avenue and another along Lehigh avenue? I can sell these three blocks among my friends and acquaintances, the majority of whom will build here at once, as their employment is in this end of the city.

The prices and terms that you have put on this property is a surprise to Trenton people, as there is nothing else to compare with it.

[Signed]

Hon. E. C. Hutchinson, Road Commissioner of New Jersey, is one of the best informed real estate authorities in Trenton. He has spent the greater part of his life here and is a heavy real estate owner himself. He says:

I consider East Trenton Heights one of the best subdivisions in Trenton. Acreage around Trenton has advanced in recent years to three and four times the price you paid for the tract you are now subdividing.

I have been much interested in watching the increase in value of real estate in Trenton for the past 30 years. I have noted that there has been a greater increase within the past 10 years by reason of the numerous industrial developments in Trenton. The old plants are enlarging and expanding, and new ones are being built at a surprising rate.

I believe you are most fortunate in having secured East Trenton Heights at a figure that will enable you to offer building lots at a price not possible for similar property so well located and feel sure a large number of Trenton people will invest and build in East Trenton Heights.

Yours very truly,

June 28, 1907. [Signed] E. C. HUTCHINSON

Mr. Woodworth Clum, Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, says:

There is no city in the country to-day that presents greater opportunities for realty development than Trenton. The city is growing day by day; its inhabitants are increasing their output and increasing their forces of working people, but the building of homes has not kept pace with the demand. It is our purpose to use every effort and argument to bring to Trenton new, desirable industries. At the present time we are negotiating with two of the largest concerns in America, looking to their removal here. What we need most is the development of that portion of our city that has been given over to the housing of the working people.

Yours very truly,

July, 1907. [Signed] WOODWORTH CLUM.

Mr. Wm. Davidson, Superintendent of the great Penna. R. R. Car Shops, where more than six hundred men are employed, says:

I am personally acquainted with one of the officers of the Company developing East Trenton Heights, and believe they offer an exceptional opportunity.

The tract they are developing adjoins the Pennsylvania Car Shops, where over 600 men are employed, and is, in my opinion, a very good investment.

This seems to be the natural resident section for those employed in this locality and should, in my opinion, be very successful.

Very truly yours,

May 18, 1907. [Signed] WM. DAVIDSON.

This is Your One Great Opportunity

Such an opportunity to secure a home site, or a good investment for your savings in one of the country's greatest industrial cities, may never be offered you again. It takes twenty years for $200 to double in a savings bank. The same amount, saved a little at a time and invested at East Trenton Heights, will be just as safe as a bank and a great many times more profitable. Take the advice of John Jacob Astor: "Buy land near the great cities." Here is an unusually favorable chance for you to do it.

Wash Day in a Korean Town

KOREA UNDER JAPANESE RULE

orean Country Women

THESE are days of stress and trial in Korea. Not in many generations has the "Hermit Kingdom" been so stirred up as by the Emperor's recent abdication, and the accession of the Crown Prince to the throne. Even Marquis Ito's statesmanship failed to conciliate the Koreans, who saw in the change of rulers the strong hand of Japan, pointing, as they believed, to the ultimate obliteration of Korea as an independent sovereign State.

As early as June last, the foolish intrigues of a weak monarch, whose country had already involved her neighbor in two costly wars, brought affairs to a climax. Japan immediately began to pour troops into Korea; but the insurrectionary movement against Japanese authority spread quickly, especially in the northern and eastern provinces. As the Korean army had been pronounced disbanded, the Korean soldiers took to the hills with their weapons. In a few places they rallied and gave fight to the hese troops; but in such cases they were quickly overcome.

l may require a few weeks to put down the insurrection and disband the f the little Korean garrisons, but nd is inevitable. Meanwhile, dis-nces will gradually become less fre-

, and life and property, both native foreign, will be safeguarded as they not been in years.

f. Homer B. Hulbert, whose extenfamiliarity with Korea has made an authority on the subject, writes the Koreans are becoming demoral-

t the rapid appropriation of valua-roperty by the Japanese. At Won-the entire shore front, formerly used tive fishermen, is now in Japanese

s. The natives are necessarily suf-

g many hardships. Many are becomddicted to the morphine habit. Many e high officials, including the defunct net, he writes, were venal: "They ith such men at the helm, with a ling as ruler, and with the whole

n in a condition bordering on demoral-on, Korea's future was far from prom-

. It was ready to fall into the hands strong Power, and Japan did not ate. For long generations the "Her-

Nation" had been virtually asleep. Its slumbers have had a rude awakening. It was the centre of military activities in the Russo-Japanese war, and in the new and important role which Japan is now filling in the drama of Eastern progress, it was inevitable that Korea should be involved. Had there been even a handful of statesmen in the capital at Seoul, the outcome might have been different; but plots and counter plots have marked the slow progress of events in Korea's capital city for years. Resident-General Ito in good faith attempted to establish reforms and to operate through mild measures; but the crisis came sooner than was expected. When the Emperor abdicated, under pressure, and when Gen. Hasegawa's Japanese troops were brought over and occupied the capital, it was the end of Korean independence. Henceforth, the "Hermit Kingdom," after a thousand years of placid existence, became virtually a province of Japan.

In Festival Dress

In her great task of empire-building, Japan has demonstrated her ability to compete with any of the Western Powers, and she has already become the paramount Power in the far East. Under her adroit statesmanship, and with the prestige of her naval and military successes, she is moving forward by gradual stages toward the ultimate Japanization, not only of Korea, but probably also of Manchuria. Korea's rich mines will supply a need which Japan lacks, and their product will materially assist in putting the empire on the soundest kind of financial basis. It is probably to be expected that valuable concessions will be jealously guarded, and few will go to foreigners. At the same time it must be admitted that Japan's declared policy is to deal fairly and generously with all foreign nations now having trading relations with the Mikado's subjects, or holding concessions in his dominions.

While much has been written alleging selfishness on the part of Japan in matters of trade, it has not yet been satisfactorily demonstrated that foreign interests are suffering at the present time, and there is consequently no good logical reason for contending that the island empire will not at least deal as fairly and generously with other nations as these nations have dealt with Japan. Doubtless, however, certain foreign interests feel aggrieved because there is no longer an opportunity for unhindered exploitation

A LABOR DAY SERMON BY

Rev. F. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.

SURPLUS WEALTH

LUKE 12: 17

"What shall I do, because I have no room where to bestow my fruits?"

THE chief character of my text is an old miser. He is just like thousands of men and women we see in daily life, or read about in the newspapers. He was evidently one of the agricultural leaders of the East. Perhaps he started as a poor boy. He may have been one of the immigrants who came to Jerusalem during Herod's administration. He may have been born in Italy, and have gone to Syria to seek his fortune. In this far-off province of the East, he hires himself out as a farm hand. He saves his wages and works hard. But he has a keen mind as well as a willing hand. He buys a little farm. There is a period of prosperity. The crops grow larger and larger. He begins to have money to invest, and he places mortgages upon his neighbors' farms and mercilessly forecloses them. His landed estate widens. He is one of those fortunate, or unfortunate, beings who, having an absorbing passion for gold, find everything turn to gold that they touch. He builds great granaries and they are always full. His sheep and cattle are browsing everywhere. His horses are the finest. His soil is the richest. Though he has many barns, the increasing crop is so great that he does not know what to do with it. He has

More Than He Can Use

In fact, he is embarrassed with the abundance of his riches. "What shall I do with all this crop?" he asks himself. "I must build larger barns. Then I will store away so much that I will never have to work any more, and just live to enjoy my wealth." Let me read you the story: "And he said, This will I do: I will pull down my barns and build greater; and there will I bestow all my fruits and my goods." Though he had more than he could use, he still kept gathering in. He doubtless thought himself a most successful man, and his neighbors, if they were such people as live in our times, envied him and looked up to him with reverence. But Christ tells us that there was another opinion of his life and character, and that, too, by One who held life and death in his hands. God said he was a fool.

Now, it is a terrible thing for God to say that of any one, for his judgment is true. None of us would like him to say that of us. Then we must be careful to avoid these faults, for God judges now by the same standard as he did in the time of this rich farmer. Now, as his fault related to his surplus wealth, it is an appropriate subject for consideration on this Sunday preceding Labor Day.

I would say to a successful man, "You know you are in affluence. You know you have more than you can eat up, or wear out. You know that you are hoarding up more money than will ever be good for your children to inherit. If you are a wise father, you will compel them to work for their living as you worked for yours. It will be better for you, instead of developing your penuriousness, to learn the Gospel law of giving and of helping. And to-day I want to tell you whom you ought to help with your surplus wealth.

Obligations of Success

First, when you begin to prosper in life, you should be willing to aid those who have been directly or indirectly the means of making it possible for you to achieve the success which is yours. You should extend the hand of gratitude to those who helped develop you in your babyhood and boyhood and youth and manhood. You should think of your father and mother in the old homestead, of your old teachers and of your old employers. They have a claim on you, for they devoted their lives to your interest; and you should now recognize the obligation to help such of them as need your help.

Then, too, there are your employees. No man ever wins his success alone. I always like to compare life to a great battle. A general has a campaign to fight; what does he do? Does he take a gun or a sword and go forth and fight that battle single handed? No; he first collects an army made up of many soldiers. Then he organizes those soldiers and drills them. He drafts those soldiers from the best homes all over the land. He gathers them from the stores and the factories. Then he sets his army in motion, and hurls it against the flanks of the enemy, and the lines are broken and the battle is won. Now, what would you think of a general who would come home from a war and say, "I did it all. The credit is all mine." Would you not consider such a man a selfish man, and an ingrate? Where were the staff officers and the right-hand men of that general? Where were the soldiers who did the weary sentinel duty and stormed the breastworks and risked their lives to make his victory possible? Are not the soldiers to have any part in the triumph and in the rewards of the nation?

Early Helpers

Ah, no. The true general and the soldiers of his army are one. When his soldiers are defeated, he shares the blame. And sometimes a general will take upon himself all the discredit of the defeat. Thus Robert E. Lee, after the battle of Gettysburg, said, "It was my fault. It was all my fault." And General Burnside, after the battle of Fredericksburg, said, "It was my fault. It was all my fault." And one of the last acts of brave Carl Schurz's life was to write a defense of his own "Eleventh Corps" which was defeated by Stonewall Jackson at Chancellorsville; while, on the other hand, one of the first acts of Sherman, or Lee, or Jackson, or Grant, or Wellington, or Napoleon, after a victory was to announce a long list of promotions for the men who had specially distinguished themselves in the fight, and for the soldiers whose sacrifices had made the victory possible. "My soldiers did it," is always the cry of the true successful general. "My soldiers! Praise me not any more than you praise the men who fight under me. If you reward me, then reward my soldiers, too."

Now, should you not act on the same principle? Have there been no other hands besides yours building your "Palace of Success?" What about your father and mother and brothers and sisters, and the teachers and friends of your youth? Have they had nothing to do with moulding your character and developing your talents? Did not your parents give up the best part of their lives to your interests? Did not your sisters and brothers make sacrifices for your education? What about the little old village church where you used to be taken as a boy and where, to a great extent, your spiritual character was formed? Have you ever done anything for that church? Have you helped to pay off its mortgage? Have you bought a new organ for that church? Have you ever sent a dollar to help support the poor widow of your old pastor, who did so much for your spiritual health? How about your old school teachers? Have you done anything for them? No. You stick your thumbs in the lapel of your coat and pat your chest approvingly, and contentedly say, "I am

A Self-made Man

These people had nothing whatever to do with my present success. I won it all. Yes, I won it all." I know from your words that your ungrateful heart has turned into stone, and that it will need a blast of dynamite to break it from its present ingratitude and forgetfulness.

Then what about your present staff of employees? Are they to receive no financial share of your present success? You know you have men working for you to-day who are simply invaluable. You know that if a rival firm should come and offer certain men in your employ a third more than they are receiving, you would be glad to advance their wages rather than lose them. You know that if hard times should come and business should run behind, you would cut your employees' wages down. And yet, when your business is prospering, you give those employees no share in the prosperity. Now, my brother, I want to ask you, is that square? Is that right? If you ask those men with whom you are associated to share your adversity when it comes, ought you not to let those same faithful men and women share your prosperity?

But there is another large class of people who need your help to-day, and who have a right to claim it. They are not the old men and women, nor the middle-aged. They are not the people who for years have been living by your side. They are not the people with whom perhaps you are even acquainted. But they are the boys and the girls, or the young folks are standing upon the threshold of life, with some ful mental, or physical, or spiritual handicap. young people have on them the taint of a bad anc heritage. Or, by financial misfortune, they are pelled to grow up amid vitiating social environm Unless some one comes to their help, they are do to make a failure out of life before they start. expects you to help them.

Here, for instance, is a young boy who has a number of brothers and sisters. He is born in beautiful city of Philadelphia. But thousands hundreds of thousands of families are there and only an atom in a great crowd. His father is a working, brave, noble man. But one day, a scaf ing upon which he is working drops, and almost in diately the husband and father is dead. His man corpse is carried home to the little cottage.

The Claim of Poor Boys

How is that boy ten years of age to get an educat Who is to feed him and to educate him and to cl him? The mother? Well, if the mother is to be bread-winner, who will stay at home and look after children? Can a weak mother do a man's work a woman's work at the same time? Is it possible for to be in two places at the same time? Unless some comes to this woman's help that boy will have chance for success. He will be sent forth to help his living almost before he is out of the nursery. may become a newsboy. He may be pitilessly thr among the vile influences of a street gutter. Then moral character, in all probability, will be wrec while he is yet only a little child. Who will the Stephen Girard to reach out the helping han rescue to that child?

Have you ever visited Girard College in Phila phia? It is one of the noblest institutions in the wo It was founded by an old miser. Stephen Girard ing his lifetime was a Shylock who always deman his full pound of flesh from his victims. In his finan dealings he seemed to be as merciless as an Ebene Scrooge, or a wrinkled-up, shriveled-hearted Mar But, though Stephen Girard was mercenary, he was fool. He knew that he could not take his gold acr the River Styx. So, as he began to grow old came nearer and nearer to the end of life, he said himself, "I must leave this money behind when I I will leave it to the people to whom it can do most good." Then he asked himself this questi "Who are the people most in need of help? W they are the children who have no fathers to h them along and to give them the right kind of a star So Stephen Girard lumped all his fortune togeth He left it to a Board of Trustees to establish an insti tion in which the fatherlesss boys of Pennsylvania co be clothed, and fed, and educated until they were a to take care of themselves. Could he have done grander work with his money? Tell me, with so ma helpless young people about, cannot you do somethi to help those young folks by your side?

Children to Adopt

But though all people should try to help the helpl young folks, this plea ought to come especially home those who have never been blessed with children. G pity the man or the woman into whose heart there h never come a little child to love and to develop. human life is complete without a child. My friend, you have not a child, bone of your bone, and flesh your flesh, to love and nurture, then for your own goo as well as for the good of some helpless children, I b and plead with you to adopt one. Do not be afra that an adopted child, on account of its unfortuna parents, may turn out badly. Dr. T. J. Barnardo, t greatest authority on children of the slums that ev lived, and the one man who saved more children to G and to worldly usefulness and respectability than oth men, gave this as his testimony: "I am strongly of th opinion that there is no inherent tendency in any bo or girl, no matter how descended, or how surrounde which may not be eradicated, or at least subjugate

A Gospel Meeting Among the "Bulls and Bears" on the Sub-Treasury Steps, Wall Street

A SUMMER GOSPEL CAMPAIGN

What the Evangelistic Committee in New York Is Doing Among the Unchurched Masses of the Metropolis

If letters received from all parts of the country and even from foreign lands are any indication, interest in the success of the work of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City is widespread. It is the aim of the Committee to "obey literally the mit of the Gospel, and the commands and example of o Lord and Saviour, in taking the message of salva- ti to the people without regard to class or creed; to g nto the most difficult fields in New York, presenting th living Christ intelligently to the p ple, depending on the Holy Spirit to m e fruitful the seed sown."

The Rev. Dr. James B. Ely is for the th d season superintendent in charge, a sted by a corps of fifty-one helpers, in uding distinguished evangelists and p chers from various sections of the c ntry, musicians, and personal work- e Many young men from represen- t ve theological colleges are associ- a d with the work. Among the volun- t assistants are nearly three hundred m bers of Young People's Societies f m various churches of this city. On a average eighteen meetings, which a non-sectarian, are held daily, with e ra services on Sunday, making in a over one hundred meetings each week a the fourteen different centres.

In sections where services have been r med in previous locations a cordial w come has greeted those identified w h the work. In some new centres, b kets of water and showers of stones r rked the opening of the tents. Such c ditions, however, are only temporary. The consecrated spirit of the Christlike m n and women who persevere in p senting the Gospel even in such t oward circumstances, soon wins the p ple to a sympathetic attitude, and frequently the highest rowdies become the stanchest helpers in the nts.

Through the zeal of a young German, Julius Hecker, ent for German-speaking people has been established the Bronx, at Elton Avenue and One Hundred and fty-eighth Street. During the very first service, the ung man saw among the converts his own sister, his mer "boss," and the carpenter who had set up the t and built the platform. The general response to e efforts here has been most remarkable.

A new centre of work this year has been the tent in "ive Points," in no wise conflicting with previously ablished missions, but rather co-operating with them. ght different nationalities are represented in the congregations filling this tent. During the street parade in that section, inside meetings were continued in the tent, being conducted in five different languages, German, Italian, Spanish, Persian and English. It was estimated that at least 2,000 people were present at one service.

That human nature is very much the same everywhere is proved by the remarkable unanimity of reports from the various services. The sailor from a foreign shore strolling into the tent at Canal Street, the commercial traveler from a distant city passing through Abingdon Square, the business man of affairs at a Wall Street meeting, the prodigal seeking further dissipation at Fort George—these men, apparently so unlike, listen with the self-same interest to the preaching, and respond to the appeals; their testimonies are sometimes almost identical, and the resolutions all tend in the same direction. 'Tis the common tale of sin and its consequences—intemperance, waywardness, neglect or desertion of mother or wife, heedlessness of early religious training.

"I haven't written to my mother for so many years! I'm going straight home to write to her," is one of the most frequent confessions.

Cornetist Leading the Singing in an Uptown Tent

"I have lost my grip on life through drink, I have lost my work and ruined my wife's happiness. I'm going to begin anew," is another all too common testimony.

Ninety per cent. of the attendants at the out-door meetings are men. The noon meetings at Wall Street are made up almost wholly of men, crowding the steps of the Custom House to listen with the same intentness as in previous years. Wall Street remains one of the strongholds of the Evangelistic Committee.

Noon meetings have been resumed outside the Western Electric Company's works, where thousands of men listen to praise, prayer and preaching. Occasionally, some man from the works contributes a musical number to the programme.

Almost pathetic is it to see the groups of young girls in their tidy blue work-gowns, crowded around the little organ on the sidewalk opposite the factory of the National Biscuit Company during their brief noon hour, to listen to the Gospel in song and story, while hundreds of heads peer down from the windows to overhear.

"To make good and worthy citizens of the aliens coming to our shores is a work of the very greatest importance, not only to them and the municipalities in which they reside, but also to the State and nation; and one might go a step further and say to the world at large," says Commissioner Watchorn. "It is no reflection on the adult population to say that the hope of the future lies in the younger generation. To teach these children to sing the inspiring words and tunes of such songs as are generally used in your meetings is a long step in the right direction."

"There is far more reason for rallying to the support of this work, because so many who believe in it are necessarily unable to engage in it," says Dr. Frank Mason North. "He who cannot put his hand to the plow may drive the share in deeper by putting his hand to his check-book. We are in a missionary field — we have a claim, so it seems to us, upon missionary money and the prayers of those who ask daily for the coming of the kingdom."

Any who are sufficiently interested to help the work may send contributions to the treasurer, John S. Huyler, 64 Irving Place, New York City. Mary K. Hyde.

WHAT LOVE DOES AT MONT-LAWN

IT'S fun to go to Mont-Lawn on Saturday, for that is the gala day of the week. There are watermelon and "lolly pop"—as Dr. Klopsch calls it—for dinner, and after dinner there are the bean game with bright prize pennies, the races for nickels, the cane game and singing, cheering and bright faces, laughter, visitors, jollity and love.

Everywhere are children; like a kaleidoscope they move to and fro, gather and scatter, press forward and run back. Sometimes it is almost impossible to move, so fearlessly do they press around newcomers, especially if the man who carries the Home in his heart is present also. During most of his visit he is bound by a live Gordian knot, a knot alive with eyes fixed upon him and ears determined to hear all he has to say. Only the magic word "skiddoo," said with a merry smile, will unloose this ring and allow him to proceed upon his way.

The dinner gong brings the children into line. Even the latest arrivals, some with homesick tears scarcely dried upon their faces, fall in very quickly, for the discipline of love brings the love of discipline, and they quickly learn from each other and from their "teachers" what is expected of them in return for what is given.

There is a march to the big open-air pavilion, a little "grace before meat" sung while the children stand, then a gong and, quick! they pounce upon their plates like little birds of prey. The first intense childish cravings satisfied, lips and eyes smile, heads nod and tongues clatter. Here and there flit the "teachers" in their fresh white dresses, helping one child to prepare her food, suggesting to another a more desirable way of holding those instruments of torture, the knife and fork, rescuing still another from a gravy accident, or passing again and again the big plate heaped with bread. For the younger ones the meat is already cut, but many others need help in this process, and often some "little mother" will be seen assisting a younger child in this dilemma, or "swapping" pieces of food to satisfy varying tastes.

Interesting little faces they are that are raised from the snowy oilcloth to answer the smiling faces above them. Some are pale and thin; some round and red with the first touch of sun; some sad with that racial sadness that makes one's heart ache; others, careless, childlike, gay. Now the children form the line once more and march from the pavilion. At the central cottage, the line breaks on signal, and away they fly in a dozen different directions, some to the swings, some to the tent, the trees, the benches, the roadsides. Play! play! play! That is all there is to do, and they do it with a will.

"'Ready—Go!' and off go the runners at a lively pace"

When Dr. Klopsch comes out from dinner, the bean game begins. In one hand he holds a box containing thirty-five Lima beans, each marked with a small red cross; in his pocket is another box filled with twice as many pennies fresh from the mint. The boys stand on one side of the terrace, the girls on the other; and as Dr. Klopsch throws the beans into the grass they count aloud with him. After the last one is thrown, there is a moment's silence; then, "Ready, go!" rings out, and with a roar and a whirr the two hundred and fifty charge down the slope and begin the search. Occasionally one or two go down in this miniature San Juan, but no serious damage is done, and the injury is shortly forgotten in the joy of spying a bean and redeeming it for a bright penny. In and out they weave; now and then come joyful cries and eager rushes to turn a fresh discovery into prize money.

"Aren't you playing?" a visitor asked in surprise of a little curly pate who sat at one side watching the game with eager eyes. All too late she noticed that the child wore a heavy brace on one leg. "It is too hard work for you," she added quickly and more gently. The child looked up, smiled and nodded.

"But my sister brings me the pennies," she replied, and taking a pocket-book from the grass by her side she proudly displayed her gains. There was no disappointment, no sadness. Love had removed all sense of loss.

The bean game played twice is followed by a march to the beautiful little chapel. Such a cheery, hopeful place it is! Here, shrill, and high, and clear the childish voices rose:

It never pays to be bad; it never pays to be bad!

They sang with such a rousing en on the "never" that it made the roo Some of the children had been at Lawn before, but all of these s to know the songs, and there w mistaking the spirit in which they rendered.

After this came the races run o gravel walk, in matched groups of There were bare feet, stocking feet, shoes and poor; but all the legs tr toward the goal in eager hope of g one of the prize nickels which waite winner of each group down by T Cottage. Then there were ties to b off, and stragglers to be matche started, and the sun actually bega downward trip before everything done.

On the upper deck of the pavilio cane game was waiting, and one b the line filed in and tossed the ring ward the fancy-headed canes. N very many canes disappeared, espec on the girls' side, but plenty of rings found wandering in strange corners.

Still more games followed. Eage tireless, the children pushed on with velous interest and energy. Not they are tucked away in their immac little white beds in the airy dormit does their energy or interest seer abate.

"The hearts of the children are so to everything good, so ready to tak the fresh air and the new ideas—so r to love and be loved," explained founder, smiling.

Love! That's the key-note at M Lawn. It is the love that overcomes and loneliness, the love that brings ob ence, that keeps the little strangers ha Love alone could make Mont-Lawn what it is. Loving thoughts back of gifts which come from all over the c try to feed and clothe these little o love, which administers these gifts in t fullest usefulness; love, which plans executes new methods for greater ser and happiness. Is there anything el the big, wide world that is really w while, except sharing and giving out t love which is "the greatest of these"?

under favorable conditions. In the fierce contest between heredity and environment, I firmly believe that, all other things being equal, environment is the more potent. No one is hopelessly handicapped by his birth conditions." In other words, with so many children in our foundling asylums who need your help, are you going to turn your back upon them and keep on growing more selfish and mean as you are aging? For God's sake, for your own sake, as well as for the children's sake, adopt a child just as soon as you can. God never meant you to live without the loving influence of some little child in your home. Take some child to your heart and throw your protecting arms about it.

Help the Fallen

We are to help those standing upon the threshold of life. We must do more than that; we are to extend financial and spiritual help to those who seem to have made a complete failure of life. We should extend the helping hand to those whose sins and errors have flung them down, and to those who have lost faith in themselves, and to those whom the world has cast aside as useless and of no account. Now, my friends, I want to tell you that no man has ever fallen so low in sin but there is yet some good in him. If we only go about it the right way, we can win that man back to the paths of truth and right. Don't growl a man into being bad, as you may easily do, but love a man into being good.

Lastly, we should help those who have lived their lives and are now in the Indian summer of their earthly existence, as well as the middle-aged who have erred, and those who are young. We should help the aged and the cripples and the chronic invalids and those whose lives will always be dependent upon others. You are to do this not only for those who are your kith and kin, but also for those who have no direct claim upon your benefaction.

Now, why should you not help the maimed and the halt and the deaf and the dumb and the blind? Are you going to save your money and leave it to your able-bodied children, so that they can lie around in ease and do nothing? Do you not realize that every dollar you give to your children, after you have given them a good education, in all probability will lessen their mental and physical vitality? If you want your boys and girls to be strong and brave and self-reliant, then you must teach them to labor as you have labored. Are you going to turn your backs upon God's helpless sick and aged, and give your all to your children, so that they shall become weak and helpless? Just run over for me the list of the sons of wealthy men of your youth. How have they turned out, handicapped with their father's wealth? Would you like your children to become as those sons of wealthy men are? Are you going to take this necessity of a struggle away from your boys and girls? Are you going to unman your children, and take from them the very which have helped to make you what you are? Then, if you are not going to squander your money upon your able-bodied children, will you not spend it where it is so much needed, in helping along the "Old Folks' Homes," in endowing hospital beds for the sick, and in helping to alleviate the sufferings of those who are dependent upon human medicament?

And I plead with you thus to scatter your money for another reason. When you begin to give your mo to the lame, the halt, the blind and the aged, the t will not be far distant when you will gladly give y own personal strength to the care of the unfortuna as well as your money. It is almost an impossibil for a man continually to give his money to the unf tunates of life, unless at the same time he gives hi self to the service. When he gives his money help unfortunate ones, the time will not be far dist when that man, as one of Christ's disciples, will working in God's vineyard with his own hands and fe

The Urgent Duty

If you are going to make anything out of your life reference to happiness, it is about time for you to co mence to work for God's unfortunate ones. You kno as well as I know, that the selfish life does not pa You know that a long succession of dances and parti does not bring to you the peace that was enjoyed b your Christian mother and father, who spent most their lives in helping God's needy. Will you, O ma stop storing up your harvests in your granaries? W you not rather scatter them abroad for suffering ma kind? Will you not give your life for others, and seeking their joys, find your own rich blessing? M God teach us to give to others, until at last we su render all for God's glory and man's happiness.

Give! as the light that flows out of heaven,
Give! as the waves when their channel is riven;
Give! as the free air and sunshine are given,
Lavishly, utterly, joyfully given.
Not the waste drops of thy cup overflowing,
Not the faint sparks of thy hearth ever glowing,
Not a pale bud from the June rose blowing,
Give as He gave thee, who gave thee to give.

NORTHFIELD'S GREATEST YEAR

MECCA OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT CROWDED AND SUCCESSFUL AS NEVER BEFORE

THE Northfield Conferences of 1907 are history now. The 18th of August came on with relentless tread, and when Rev. G. Stuart Holden had spoken the last word and Mrs. W. R. Moody had added a song of sweetness, pathos and power, there was nothing left to do but shake the hand of our neighbor, look with a calm regret at the interior of the great auditorium, and go quietly out under the sky of a serene August night, in whose midheaven the almost full moon rode on her westward way. The General Conference of 1907—the twenty-fifth session—was over.

But it was prophecy. Its keynote has been salvation. Golden mornings Rev. G. Campbell Morgan struck the great tune, adding morning by morning the other notes that make triads and harmonies. His was the master voice, and the hours of each day that followed the first morning hour, as the guide led the throng through the mazes of St. Paul's labyrinthine Epistle to the Romans, were filled with tones tuned to the leader's key. And the voice was the voice of a prophet. The world grows better, and it will. Christ died to save men, and he will not be defeated. God's eternal purpose was redemption, and the hour of his long, clear vision draws nearer and nearer with each cycle. The mills grind slowly, but with exactness. The great gathering has made history, and now, with lofty purpose, its units separate to do the work in the coming days that will help fulfil the prophecy.

Seven weeks of Conferences have run their round. The Student's Conference was on with the first days of July, and the one hundred men from colleges and universities and schools in almost every land listened to great words from other young men, a little farther along life's highway than the gathered students. Fun and fervor were mingled; and the leaders and the led found real joy in touching hands in sport out on the green lawns and in prayer up in the tall old pines.

No less earnest, no less ably and no less deeply spiritual, was the Young Women's Conference. The boys vanished; the girls appeared. White dresses floated over Round Top Hill and women's voices sent the sweetest songs the world knows echoing across from Northfield's campers to Hermon's pines. We know one who was a working girl in a mill, who found there a year ago a touch with Christian love that was the opening to her of a gate to a new world. We have seen her grow spiritually in the intervening year, and her vacation days found her once more here drinking from the fountain of inspiration toward nobler living, which these Conference days opened to her thirsty soul. Then came the Missionary Conference. That was, like the others, permeated with evangelistic power. In the closing afternoon of the General Conference, Charles M. Alexander sang, "O Lord, send the power down now," and drew his audience along after him in a mighty wave of song. But he was too late. The Lord had sent the power days and days before. It was here when John R. Mott was speaking. It was here when the great missionary secretary, Robert E. Speer, was here. The earnestness of these missionary men and women is something phenomenal.

And then came on the General Conference of Christian Workers. There have never been such numbers here before. The ability of the management was taxed to its utmost. When people think of the name of Moody, they think always of Dwight Lyman Moody. Then when they are reminded that the elder Moody's son is conducting with marvelous executive force the various enterprises put on foot by the father, they make their word of admiring comment and think they have done the subject justice. But they have not. There is another Moody, Paul, the younger son of D. L. Moody, who plans for and leads the Round Top meetings with great skill.

There were great speakers here. Mr. F. B. Meyer, of England; Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, of England; Rev. G. Stuart Holden, of St. Paul's, Portman Square, London; Professor James Orr, of Scotland. They were enough. Four such men in fourteen brief days could break more mental and spiritual loaves than the five thousand could carry away. But they were not all. Our own American pulpit contributed once, and twice, and again preachers of marvelous power. The Baptist Church had Dr. Mabie, their eloquent missionary secretary, and the prince of Southern pulpit orators, Rev. Dr. Len. G. Broughton, of Atlanta, Ga. The Methodists had here one of the most forceful speakers this denomination knows—Dr. C. L. Goodell, of New York. The Presbyterians had Pentecost, and Pearson and young John McDowell, a Mount Hermon product, and a great force for righteousness. But no one recked what name a man called himself by. This was a Conference of Christians.

Mr. Meyer went early. Mr. Lane, who was with "Gipsy Smith" in his great evangelistic work beyond the seas, was heard but once. The globe-circler, Charles M. Alexander, with his piano companion, Robert Harkness, was on the platform every day. His power to move a great audience is very wonderful. He is a sort of Elijah; he knows how to bring down the "old-time fire." But when it comes to the hour for deep spiritual peace out of the service of song, no man can surpass George C. Stebbins. For almost forty years he has been an unapproachable leader in devotional song.

The great feature of the Conference was Dr. Morgan's morning hour with the Epistle to the Romans. His analysis was complete; his exposition masterful; his running comments spicy, trenchant, diverse, sometimes humorous, and always enjoyable. His exegesis was at times very new, and almost startling; and the Presbyterians had a jolt when he declared that foreordination was based on divine foreknowledge.

Dr. G. Stuart Holden came a stranger, preached almost every day once; on the last Sunday twice, and continues to speak in the post-conference series of meetings until September 8. His subjects are to be "Devotional Studies in Ephesians," and "Laws from Heaven for Life on Earth." He does not go away a stranger. The great audience has learned to love him, and will rejoice if another year finds him on the platform.

And so the Conferences are done. The thousands have scattered. The record is made. Northfield, 1907, is history. It was prophecy. It remains for those who were of it, and in it, to make new history by making its prophecy real.

RICHARD S. HOLMES.

Remarkable Meetings at Nanking, China

FROM the letters of a native student at the seminary we select the following particulars concerning meetings recently held in Nanking, China:

"There are now in Nanking Dr. Lee and Miss Yu, both of Soochow, who are holding meetings. Sometimes the meetings are for men, sometimes for women, sometimes for both. Once there were over 800 present. Dr. Lee has spoken for a week, twice daily: Miss Yu at 2 P.M. to the women; and indeed it is an evidence of God's power manifested among us Chinese, these two who spoke with such power being Chinese. On December 16, Sabbath, in the afternoon, it was like the day of Pentecost. The Holy Spirit came down with power. After Dr. Lee had spoken on Rev. 3: 1-7 the Holy Spirit suddenly came upon all. Then at prayer many wept aloud."

The World's Lease of Life

IN his new book on the Origin and Formation of Worlds, reviewed recently in a New York periodical, Professor Arrhenius of Sweden expounds his theory of the duration of the earth. He takes issue with Lord Kelvin and other eminent scientists as to the condition of the solar system, and declares that they are mistaken about the sun burning up and the earth cooling, and expresses the belief that things will go on as they are for millions of millions of years. On the validity of the reasoning on which he bases his belief, scientists must decide, and already his theory is meeting with vigorous opposition. On the other hand, it is welcomed with enthusiasm by men who shrink from the thought of the collapse which his opponents predict.

There is as little personal reason for the one feeling as for the other. The scientists who look for the approaching destruction of the universe, do not expect it to occur for thousands or even millions of years, so they are not themselves concerned in the disaster; while those who agree with Prof. Arrhenius need not exult, as they cannot remain to enjoy the world's prolonged lease of life. The end of the world for every man is the termination of his existence upon it; and while we naturally are concerned for the welfare of our descendants, even the shorter period is too remote to cause a serious shock to our affections. The ardor with which men throw themselves into worldly pursuits, and their indifference to spiritual concerns, would suggest that they expect to live on through the centuries, but as a matter of fact none have that expectation. The man who clings to life, if he forgets the hour of his departure, has plenty of reminders from others if he lingers long in the world, that it is time he moved on and made room for his heirs. He must go, and the city's streets and the country hillsides are occupied by another generation. Whether this will continue for a thousand years, as some scientists think, or for a billion as Arrhenius contends, need not concern us.

Such a contention as that of our author, however, is by no means new. In apostolic days men drew a similar inference from the fact that "since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation," and they were warned that the day would come when the elements should "melt with fervent heat, the earth also and the works that are therein shall be burned up." We shudder at the idea of that universal catastrophe, however remote it may be, but there are few of us who act on the lesson drawn from the warning: "Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought we to be?" To those who do learn the lesson, the promise remains, looking beyond the general wreck—the promise of "new heavens and a new earth," not such as this, sin-cursed, full of sorrow and misery and oppression, but a new earth, "in which dwelleth righteousness."

The President at Provincetown

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT was the central figure of interest on the occasion of the cornerstone-laying of the Pilgrim Memorial Monument at Provincetown, Mass., on August 21. He made the principal address to an audience of 15,000. After paying a high tribute to the Puritans, and the influence they have exerted on our national life, he passed to current affairs, and dealt with the burning question of trusts and corporations.

Although this was not the first occasion upon which the President had discussed the same subject with pen or voice, national interest had centred upon the Provincetown celebration in the expectation of a deliverance which would be, in effect, an outline of the government's policy in the future stages of the great crusade. In this aspect, the address was an admirable presentation—clear, vigorous and perfectly consistent throughout. National conditions have wholly changed since Puritan days, necessitating changed laws and governmental methods in dealing with the new problems. He said:

Especially is this true in dealing with the relations of the people as a whole to the great corporations, which are the distinguishing feature of modern business conditions.

Experience has shown that it is necessary to exercise a far more efficient control than at present over the business use of those vast fortunes, chiefly corporate, which are used as under modern conditions they almost invariably are in interstate business. When the constitution was created none of the conditions of modern business existed. They are wholly new and we must create new agencies to deal effectively with them.

There is no objection in the minds of this people to any man's earning any amount of money if he does it honestly and fairly, if he gets it as the result of special skill and enterprise, as a reward of ample service actually rendered. But there is a growing determination that no man shall amass a great fortune by special privilege, by chicanery and wrong-doing, so far as it is in the power of legislation to prevent, and that the fortune when amassed shall not have a business use that is anti-social.

Efforts to control, by State action, large corporations doing an interstate business had proved a failure, as far as correcting the real abuses were concerned, and often resulted in hardship and injustice.

We must be as scrupulous to safeguard the rights of the corporations as to exact from them in return a full measure of justice to the public.

I believe in a national incorporation law for corporations engaged in interstate business. I believe, furthermore, that the need for action is most pressing as regards those corporations which, because they are common carriers, exercise a quasi-public function; and which can be completely controlled in all respects by the federal government by the exercise of the power conferred under the interstate commerce clause, and, if necessary, under the post-road clause, of the constitution.

The national government should exercise over them a similar supervision and control to that which is exercised over national banks. We can do this only by proceeding further along the lines marked out by the recent national legislation.

First attempts would necessarily be experimental. Legislatures, courts and people need to be educated to see the real wrongs and the right remedies. The people had become convinced of the need of corporation control before they had a clear idea how it was to be accomplished. He referred to the unsatisfactory legislation on the subject—the Sherman Anti-Trust Law, and the Inter-State Commerce Act—and then declared his conviction that the national government "must pass laws which, while increasing the supervisory and regulatory power of the government, also permit such useful combinations as are made with absolute openness and as the representatives of the government may previously approve. But it will not be possible to permit such combinations save as the second stage in a course of proceedings of which the first stage must be the exercise of a far more complete control by the national government."

Many men of great wealth, the President declared, have been guilty of conduct which he regarded as morally and legally reprehensible. On this point he added these significant words:

When in addition to moral responsibility these men have a legal responsibility which can be proved so as to impress a judge and jury, then the department will strain every nerve to reach them criminally. Where this is impossible, then it will take whatever action will be most effective under the actual conditions.

In the last six years we have shown that there is no individual and no corporation so powerful that he or it stands above the possibility of punishment under the law.

The stock market disturbance he regarded as not due specially to American causes and conditions, and not at all to the government's course, but he believed that certain "malefactors of great wealth" had combined to aggravate the financial stress in order to discredit the policy of the government, and to secure, if possible, a reversal of that policy. Their actions, however, will not swerve the government from its purpose. Here are the President's words:

Once for all, let me say that as far as I am concerned, and for the eighteen months of my administration that remain, there will be no change in the policy steadily pursued, no let-up in the effort to secure the honest observance of the law, for I regard this contest as one to determine who shall rule this government—the people through their governmental agents or a few ruthless and determined men whose wealth makes them particularly formidable, because they hide behind the breastworks of corporate organization.

He explained, however, that no action of a vindictive type was contemplated, and above all, no action which shall inflict great or unmerited suffering upon the innocent stockholders and upon the public as a whole. Our purpose is to act with the minimum of harshness compatible with obtaining our ends. In the man of great wealth who has earned his wealth honestly and used it wisely we recognize a good citizen worthy of all praise and respect. Business can only be done under modern conditions through corporations, and our purpose is to heartily favor the corporations that do well.

In this authoritative announcement of the government's inflexible attitude and purpose, there is little that can be regarded as a subject for adverse criticism by those who share with the President the desire to see the laws properly enforced. Yet it cannot be denied that the occasion and manner of the announcement were extremely spectacular. It is more than unusual for the official head of a great people to thus publicly arraign a class of men who, not so very long ago, almost dictated the national policies. Such an arraignment becomes at once historic. Yet, we do not forget that, accordi to the good old rule, trial must precede conviction nd while the multitude doubtless agree with the Pres nt in the main, few will regard as justifiable or concl we the sweeping imputation against men of wealth gene y, which the address would seem to convey.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has nothing to do with p es and politics. It stands for righteousness in the hom in business and the nation. It aims to keep its re rs intelligently informed upon all matters that affect se interests. They are capable of judging for thems es whether the President's address, the essential poin of which we have indicated above, is to be interprete as contemplating injustice in the enforcement of the l , or whether our government is at all likely to stoop t e vindictive prosecution of any class, or to do any act at would be destructive of business confidence and unju o the material interests of a very large class of our citi s. Strong words may mean much or little; but to the ho t and law-abiding, they convey no apprehension. A r the real offenders, let them be dealt with accordin o the dignified and decorous processes of established , and not in a whirlwind of zeal, which would pull d n the Temple of Justice about our ears, overwhelm g innocent and guilty alike in the ruin.

Simple Trust

HOW very strange it seems, at a superficial gla e, that nothing in this life is ever quite per t. There seems to be almost always an "if" or a "b " that prevents human existence from being enti y placid and satisfactory.

For instance, business affairs are prospering, e home is charmingly located, the children are growin n health and beauty; but there is a cloud on the hori , for the dear mother is feeble, and there is a fear t she may be taken away. That is the situation in e house. In another there is everything that heart n wish and the family are absolutely united in love d fellowship; but there is an imbecile son, and the anx y and distress on his account cannot be put into wo . A pessimistic view, taking into account the many appointments, defeats and infelicities of life, the th that forever guards the rose, the bitter drop beneath e sweetness, would incline us to believe that the univ e was somehow out of gear, and that a malevolent ge s behind the scenes was pulling wires that human he s might break.

Away with this pessimistic view! "God's in his heav , all's right with the world!" Were this earth to be an shadowed Eden; were there to be no minor chords in music; were pleasure never to be interrupted by pai harmony by discord, we should have no desire to change earth for heaven. We grow in proportion to resistance we make to trouble and sorrow. Spirit strength is conserved by much communion with hea and by taking hold of the unseen.

Well for the man and woman who, in simple tr can say "everything is beautiful"; but the consumm tion, the coronation, the gladness to be, are laid up store in the Father's house above.

War in Morocco

[R]OTS in Casablanca, Morocco, have developed into [a] state of war. The proclamation of a Jehad, or holy war, has been solemnly and formally made [by] the reading of a declaration in the streets of Fez by [the] Mullah, and the army of the tribesmen increases [from] day to day. Gen. Drude, the French commander, [has] urgently appealed to his government for reinforcements, but only a pitiful force of nine hundred men has been sent. With barely five thousand men, he is surrounded by a fierce horde of twenty thousand Moors, well mounted, and courageous in the extreme. Up to the time of writing Gen. Drude has been able to repulse every attack made upon him, but he has not dared to assume the offensive. His quiescence has encouraged the audacity of the Moors, and scarcely a day passes without their renewing their assaults on his position. It is almost certain that before this his forces would have been annihilated if he had not had the assistance of the vessels in the harbor, which have shelled the attacking Moors when they were seen to be approaching the town. The guns do terrible execution among the Moorish horsemen, but the aim from the ships is not always good, and then the French troops have hard work to repulse their assailants. It is clear that France has undertaken a more difficult task than was expected when she entered Moroccan territory. The presence of the European appears to have aroused the country, and a faction of the people have declared the Sultan deposed for not using more energetic measures to expel the invader. The Sultan's brother, a fierce and unrelenting foe of the foreigner, has been elevated to the throne, but is scarcely likely to maintain his position when the present troubles are over. There is no doubt that France would take more vigorous measures if she were not restrained by fear of the attitude of Germany. The Algeciras Conference gave her permission to restore order in Morocco, but she has no authority to make a war of subjugation. She is consequently in a difficulty that will not be solved without diplomatic negotiation. She professes that she has no desire to annex the country, but her professions are doubted by Germany, and she cannot afford to provoke a conflict with that Power. She is realizing the truth of the warning uttered long ago by the inspired writer:

The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water; therefore leave off contention before there be quarreling. (Prov. 17:14, R.V.)

The Chief Mullah in Morocco Proclaiming "a Holy War"

Settled by a Meteor

Visitors and residents of Amagansett, Long Island, had a startling experience on Sunday, August 18. It was a quiet evening on the beach, and the sky was clear. Suddenly there was a roar like prolonged thunder that was almost deafening. Persons on the beach looked seaward in surprise and saw a blazing light, reaching almost from the zenith to the surface of the water. The sight was blinding and evidently proceeded from a huge mass, which struck the water only a short distance from shore, near the lifesaving station. It appeared to be about seventy-five feet in circumference and must have weighed several tons. As it struck the sea, there was a loud hissing noise and an upheaval of the waters that alarmed the people. The huge breakers that came rushing in, reached a height never before witnessed on the coast, sweeping away bathing pavilions and everything movable on the beach. The spectacle must have been very alarming and the spectators must have congratulated themselves that the meteor fell into the water and not upon the town. One can but wonder from what world such immense fragments are torn off and sent whirling through space. Happily for us, such destructive bodies are not the only visitants from the celestial regions that come to the earth. The experience of the world through past ages encourages us to look upward to the skies with hope rather than with terror. All good and the greatest good of all, the supreme blessing to mankind, descended from the heavens.

This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die. (John 6: 50.)

A Lost Relic

The keepers of a famous shrine near Avellino, Italy, have been mourning for some months the disappearance of a treasured relic, which they lost sight of in February last. It was a crystal vessel, said to contain the blood of St. Pellegrino. Search was made for it in likely and unlikely places, but no trace was found of it. The revolutionary society known as the Camorra was recently suspected of having committed some diabolical murders. The authorities were aroused, and, after an investigation, arrested four members of the gang. In searching their homes for evidence, they found in one of them a private chapel and in it was the relic. It has now been ascertained that members of the Camorra were in the habit of making pilgrimages to this private oratory to invoke heavenly aid in their criminal enterprises. Ludicrous is the idea of heavenly aid being granted to criminal enterprises, and of the saint's blood being used as a talisman; yet better educated people nearer home have been known to pray for a blessing on themselves, even while they are living in sin.

When ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear: your hands are full of blood. (Isa. 1: 15.)

His Life for Cards

A porter employed in the Grand Central Station, New York, lost his life a few days ago by a strange accident. His duties consisted in carrying baggage from the trains. While at work he saw lying beside the track a box of playing cards, which had fallen from the window of an incoming train. He probably did not notice that the rail under which they lay was the third rail, which carries the electricity. He stooped down and reached for the cards, and without a word or a cry fell down. His fellow employees went to his assistance immediately, but he was unconscious. The hand in which the cards were grasped and the wrist were severely burned. A physician was called at once, but on his arrival he pronounced the man dead. He said that death must have occurred instantaneously when his hand came in contact with the rail. The foremen say that it was no part of his duty to remove fallen articles from the tracks; but he must have coveted the cards when he saw them and have risked his life to get them. It was a pitiful booty for which to incur such danger. But many a gambler at the close of his career has realized that there are greater dangers than this man braved. The cards led him to risk his life, but they have tempted others to sacrifice their souls. Even the man who makes a fortune by gambling is a loser.

He that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool. (Jer. 17: 11.)

A Husband's Right

A wife appeared in a New York police court recently to answer a summons obtained by her husband. He complained that she interfered with his plans and prevented him from going on a journey. Her answer was that he proposed placing his three trunks and a clothes basket containing various implements on a hand-cart which he had built himself, and to go on a tour of New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Ohio. If he had proposed to put his luggage on an express wagon like a decent man, she would not have interfered; but she wanted to keep him from making a fool of himself. The magistrate told her it was her husband's right to make a fool of himself if he wished, and she must not interfere if he chose to do it in that particular way. We must presume the magistrate knows the law in the case. Perhaps it is the best thing for the man to do as he wishes. He will realize his folly in that way better than by attempting to control him. It would seem, from some persons' lives, that God takes that course with them.

Let them alone: they be blind leaders of the blind. And if the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch. (Matt. 15: 14.)

Perils of the Boilers

One of the most dreaded perils of the sea are the structures constructed by the coral insects, which build the huge mountains in the deeper regions. Several of these obstructions are found off the coast of Bermuda and are known as "boilers." They rise to within a foot of the surface of the water and are exposed at low tide or when a wave eddying near them reveals their presence. A party of three biologists, under the guidance of Prof. Rand of Cambridge, went out to examine the boilers recently. They found considerable difficulty in reaching them, owing to the dread of sailors of going near them. At times the waves turn suddenly to a whirlpool over the tops of the boilers. An experienced boatman was at length induced to take the party out. He approached the boilers as near as he dared and then the party waited their opportunity and jumped. It was a dangerous business, for the water around is believed to be forty fathoms in depth. All four landed safely and had examined the recesses of this strange construction, which they believed held the clues to some of nature's secrets, when the sea suddenly rose. The boatman knew the meaning of that rise and gave a warning cry. Dr. Rand and his companions prostrated themselves and clung with all their might to the sides of the boiler and when the wave passed they swam back to the boat, having been as close to death as any who have ever escaped to tell the tale. Learned men in the pursuit of knowledge do not often consider the danger they incur. One can but wish that there was the same spirit of courage and self-sacrifice in the pursuit of spiritual knowledge, which is of infinitely greater value.

None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received. (Acts 20: 24.)

ON THE COOL HOME VERANDA

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Passing of the Old-Maid Aunt

WHAT has become of the old-maid aunt? She used to be a dear familiar figure, ready to come at the call of the weary mother, willing to fit in at a moment's notice if there were a household emergency, invaluable in moving time, and in a hundred ways she added to the homely comfort of the house. To be sure, there are no old maids in these days, at least in the sense in which useful single women once bore the epithet. The phrase conveyed to some ears a certain stigma, but to others it was fragrant with the aroma of lavender leaves and dried rose petals. The old maid of other days was a person of detachment and leisure. If she made her home with a married sister or brother, she could no more be spared without leaving a vacuum than the mother herself, and many a time she gave the mother a free foot while she stayed at home, managed the housekeeping and looked after the children. The position was not always agreeable, if the relation-in-law, either husband or wife, happened to be stingy and sordid. On the other hand, it was often peculiarly delightful.

At present, single women are supporting themselves in independence, and have no special vocation in the line of rendering unpaid household assistance. Commerce everywhere requires the helping hand of women. In our modern day and in the Far East, changeless for so many centuries, there are thousands of working women engaged in the manufacture of textile products. In our own lands working women form a great army, the ranks recruited from an unmarried sisterhood, drawn from every age from sixteen to fifty.

The child of the period must get along as best he can without the coddling, petting and gentle restraining that used to be his portion when there was always an auntie to take his part, help him with his lessons, mend his ball and cover up his little delinquencies.

The aunt who used to come in like a ministering angel when scarlet fever and measles invaded the nursery is to-day a professional, has received hospital training and is a factor in illness second only to the physician himself. In cases of real illness she is sent for precisely as the doctor is, and she has few opportunities to engage in gratuitous service. Instead of making and mending clothes for her nieces and nephews, she is a fashionable dressmaker turning out artistic gowns and wraps, securing high prices and putting aside money for a rainy day. Where once she stayed at home that her married sister might go on trips and jaunts, she now escorts parties to Europe or the Yosemite, chaperones young girls just out of college, and is so jolly a comrade and so discreet a confidante that the love affairs of young people are entrusted to her sympathetic keeping.

What the home has lost in the passing of the spinster aunt the community has gained, and she has emerged from a condition that had its drawbacks of dependence and tolerance, and that was often marred by ingratitude, into a contrasting situation of admirable independence and unchallenged respect. The old-maid aunt is as sweet as ever now that society regards her as an ornament, yet it is impossible that homes should relinquish her without a sigh on their own account.

HELLO, PAPA!

"Hello!" she cries, the little dear.
Her voice is very sweet and clear.
Her father, at his desk down town,
Sees cheeks of pink and eyes of brown,
And smiles to hear his daughter say,
"I hope you'll soon be home to-day!"
From heart to heart the magic wire
Sends thrills of Love's divinest fire,
Though only little Gene at home,
Is hoping daddy soon will come.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—G. Z. G. There is no rule as to the size of a wedding fee. It is decided by the means and liberality of the bridegroom, and may be any amount from one dollar to fifty. It is usually quietly handed to the minister by a friend of the groom. Fees are not usual at funerals. If a clergyman is called upon to make a journey that he may attend a funeral, his traveling expenses should be paid.

—Mary. In marrying John Smith you surrender your maiden name. On your visiting cards you must be simply Mrs. John Smith. Your husband's visiting card should be engraved Mr. John Smith. Your own legal signature may be Mary Hancock Smith.

—M. D. An unknown writer should simply send his manuscript to a publishing house, giving his full address and enclosing stamps for its return if declined. The story or book will be read by competent critics, and if accepted will be published in due time. The usual method of the publisher is to pay a royalty of ten per cent. of the retail price of the book, after the sale of the first one thousand copies.

Where is the Dead-Line?

A GOOD many years ago Anthony Trollop brilliant novelist, wrote an interesting ro entitled The Fixed Period. In its pa set forth the idea that life and activity together cease at a definite time. He suggested as a suitable age for retiring and for a painless dep by a scientific method of egress from the busy sce this world. At twenty-five his hero thought fav of the scheme and exploited it with enthusiasm. he approached the boundary line of it presented itself to him in a very ent aspect. Youth and age do not together understand each other's po view, and the fixed period, should th one, would have to be put nearer on dred than sixty, to satisfy the or human being.

Recently a well-known professor o icine in a widely criticized essay proc that in a majority of cases a man's was finished at sixty; that the best must be done before forty, and that, all in all, the opportunity for ren efficient service in this world was e ingly short and restricted. One ma whether Dr. Osler was any more in e in advancing his theory than Mr. Tr had been before him.

In refutation of the idea that goo successful work along new lines c done only by youthful hands and b we have at this moment the best book of the year, Alice-for-Short, De Morgan. This author has flashed the reading world like a splendid m at the age of sixty-five, recalling in th books that he has written the fine m and minute observation of Charles Di and the gentle humor of W. M. Thack In the matter of his books he rese none of the older novelists, but has ceeded in striking out on a brillian original plan of his own. In Joseph as in Alice he brings to the stage not puppets moved by a string at their cre pleasure, but men and women of lik sions with ourselves, who live and bre enjoy and suffer, precisely as we do. books are full of youthful charm vivacity, of sympathy with childhood comprehension of young people, yet are the work of a man past his meri and stepping forward with undaunted toward three-score and ten.

Our beloved Mark Twain has score latest success in a series of successful e prises in his recent visit to London. he had the world at his feet; people classes and conditions, from the high the lowest, emulating one another in desire to pay honor to the genial hum on whose head have fallen the snows o and seventy years. It would almost as if there were something absurd in c anybody old in whom still glow be the wrinkles the fires of youth.

Your Boy at Sixteen

Fathers and mothers should not surprised if the boy at sixteen is a harder to manage than he was at To expect from a boy on the of his young manhood the instant and plicit obedience that is the province of the nursery little unreasonable. To require of him an accoun every hour that he passes outside the threshold an every cent he spends, particularly when he is at earning a weekly wage, is unwisely to keep him in ing strings. He should be given an elastic tether. his own sake, and in order to develop a sense of respo bility, he should be expected either to give somet into the home exchequer or to purchase a part of his clothing. He will get through the reefs and shoa adolescence with comparative safety, if there be not much surveillance, too many restrictions and the bli ing influence of too much censure.

GABRIELLE

THE "FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE"

By Isabella MacFarlane

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. The father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but leaves a note on the fly-leaf of a psalm-book explaining his plight. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. With her cousin Rosalie she attends the festival of the Gathering of the Rosiere. While there, Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Repulsed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Her father leaves. Gabrielle takes to walks through the forest to be alone with her grief. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him that her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle is secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart to the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She falls out, and the driver discovers he has had a Huguenot as a passenger. He runs to give the alarm. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured by a coast guard, who takes her to a convent. The nuns start to convert her. Late at night she unscrews the bars from her window and escapes to the shore. She finds a fisherman waiting with his boat. He takes her to the ship, and proves to be Captain Girard in disguise. He wishes to go with her, but she sends him back to his duty. He is arrested on his return and sent to the galleys, the king refusing to pardon him. In the galleys he is placed next to Louis Marquand, and they become firm friends, not knowing they are rivals for the love of Gabrielle.

CHAPTER XV

On the High Seas

VERY few things had occurred to break the monotony of the life led by our two friends, Louis Marquand and Francis Girard. The changing of the galley La Grande from one station to another, the shifting of a fleet of galleys, the occasional inspection by some high dignitary, or the arrival of a fresh batch of "criminals," so filled—and the weary grind was resumed.

Louis stood the ordeal much better than his companion. To begin with, he was a man of firm, well-balanced mind, and had led a pure life. It was hard to have his life thus cut in two, and his cup of happiness plucked from his lips, but, conscious of rectitude, and believing in the goodness of God, he never for a moment doubted that he would be delivered from his thraldom, and re-united to the woman he loved.

This hope seemed to keep up, not only his spirits, but his bodily strength. Ah! there is a world of meaning in the old fable of Pandora's Box!

Francis, on the other hand, had been reared in luxury, and exposed to the indulgences and temptations that beset his rank and profession, which had sapped the foundations of a naturally good constitution, and unfitted him to bear hardship.

On the very first day of his work as a galley-slave, his hands became so blistered and abraded that the blood flowed from them, and he suffered excruciating pain. Louis, moved with compassion, tore a strip from his shirt and bound them up, at the same time showing him how to handle the oar in a better manner.

From that time Louis, who was, as has been said, a few years the elder of the two, took a sort of fatherly or elder-brotherly interest in him, helping him in every way that he could, for which he received little acknowledgment from the other, who was cross, surly and unhappy.

When they had lived this miserable life for three or four years, there came an unexpected change.

The religious persecutions continuing throughout France, the prisons were overflowing, the galleys overcrowded. It was then that the king and his advisers resolved to transport a few thousands of his Huguenot subjects to his West Indian colonies there to be leased to the planters as slaves or peons, and obliged to work under the broiling sun of the tropics, on the same footing as their negro slaves.

No fate was more dreaded than this. Even the galley-slaves shrank from it as a condition far worse than their own. But to this fate many of them were doomed, when sickness or want of strength had rendered them unfit any longer to ply the oar.

Among those selected for deportation was No. 15,517, once known by the name of Francis Girard.

He received the intimation with a sort of dull despair.

"Why don't they knock me on the head at once, and make an end of me?" he said, bitterly.

But Louis viewed the matter very differently. To him the change, terrible as it was, suggested possibilities of that escape of which he was always dreaming, but of which he had hitherto seen no prospect. True, the lot had not fallen on him, but he succeeded, by feigning sickness and inability to use his arms, in being selected as one of the transports.

They embarked at Marseilles with a crowd of other unfortunates, and were bound for St. Christopher, that pretty island of the Caribbean Sea, which Columbus named in honor of his patron saint, from its fancied resemblance to the statues of that holy man with the infant Christ on his shoulder, but which is better known to modern ken by the less dignified name of St. Kitts.

The miseries of these transport ships opened a new page of suffering, but we shall not touch on the details, except so far as they concern the two persons in whom we are interested.

There were seventy worn-out galley-slaves on board, confined in a space barely sufficient for twenty. They were, however, occasionally permitted to sit or lie on the deck, a few at a time, chained two and two together. Louis contrived that he and Francis should always be comrades.

After three years of close companionship on the galley, chained to the same bench, pulling on the same oar, it was only when they found themselves on the transport ship that the two men obtained the knowledge of each other's identity, such was the taciturnity in which they had lived. The discovery came even then almost by accident.

One day, as the two were squatting on the deck, gazing out on the vast expanse of waters, Louis, observing that the trend of the vessel's course was ever southward, exclaimed almost unconsciously:

"Oh that our course were toward New York, where doubtless my Gabrielle and her people are now settled!"

Francis started, and fixing his haggard eyes on the face of his companion, said abruptly:

"Are you Louis Marquand?"

"I am. But how do you know my name?"

"I thought so! I suspected it from the first. She said her lover was a galley-slave! And the man I saw in the courtyard was of your height and build—but I scarcely noticed him—I had no eyes for any but her!" said Francis, wildly.

"What are you talking of? Have you gone crazy?" said Louis, amazed.

"No. I almost wish I had. Then perhaps I could forget. So you are my rival the man who stood between me and happiness the man whom Gabrielle de Bonnefoy loves?"

"Explain yourself, sir," said Louis, somewhat haughtily. "What do you know of me and my affairs? What connection have you with Gabrielle de Bonnefoy? Who are you?"

"I am no, I was Captain Francis Girard, of the King's Dragoons."

It was Louis' turn to start in astonishment.

"Captain Girard? The leader of the dragonnades? I do not understand."

"Oh, it is very simple. As leader of one branch of the dragonnades, I saw a beautiful girl of the Huguenots. I sought her love. I failed, alas! to win it. There was but one thing I could do—but one favor she would accept of me. I assisted her to escape, rescuing her from a treacherous rascal of a fisherman who meant to betray her to the authorities, as he did myself. That is all."

A pang of jealousy shot through the heart of Louis Marquand. Bit by bit he drew the story from the half-reluctant lips of Girard—and at last how, finally, he had taken her to the ship, and gone back to the shore—to be arrested and condemned for aiding a Huguenot to escape. "But I did aid her. I did save her. That is the only consolation I have in my miserable condition."

"And for that I thank you with all my heart!" said Louis.

Then a long pause ensued. Many conflicting emotions passed over the mind of Louis.

"Come!" said he. "We are companions in misery. Let us still be friends. Let us drop this rivalry for the love of a woman whom neither of us may ever see again, and let us devote every energy to the thought," he dropped his voice to a whisper, "of escape. St. Christopher, as you are aware, belongs partly to the French and partly to the English. Could we escape from the plantations to the English settlements of Nevis or St. Eustatius, we would be free. Between the French and English parts lies a wilderness of swamps, forests, rocks and mountains, well named Mount Misery, but some have succeeded in passing it—why not we?"

"That is all very well for you," said Girard, sullenly. "If you reach there, you can take ship for New York, seek out this girl and marry her. But I—?"

"You will be free also. You can return to France, where you have a mother."

"Ah! my mother! She tried to obtain a pardon for me, but did not succeed."

"She may try again, and be more successful."

Here one of the guards, suspicious of this whispered conversation, ordered them to desist, and soon after removed them to their narrow quarters below.

"'It is a free pardon, obtained from the king,' said the general"

CHAPTER XVI

The Island of St. Christopher

AFTER a voyage of five months, the glistening white coral strand of St. Christopher came in sight. Beyond it rose, one above another, the natural terraces on which are found the fields and gardens of the plantations, showing in vivid contrast the yellow sugarcane, the pale green of the tobacco plant, and the dark green leaves of the ginger and the sweet potato. Above these the palms waved their

Never Fades, Cracks, Chalks, Peels or Blisters, and Is Not Affected By Gases or Salt Air. Fifty Sample Colors Prepaid To Any Address Absolutely Free

The cost of painting is a heavy burden. Cheap paints soon fade, peel or scale off and white lead and oil costs so much and has to be replaced so often that it is a constant expense to keep the bright, clean appearance so desirable in the cosy cottage home or the elegant mansion.

Carrara Paint Is Used on the Most Beautiful Homes of the Country

The Waldorf-Astoria and many of the magnificent hotels in New York City are painted with the world-famous Carrara Paint, and this is also true of many of the famous clubs and public buildings of the great metropolis. Most all of the great railroad, palace car, telephone and electric companies use Carrara Paint in preference to any other, because they proved it best by trial. Field Museum, Chicago, covering over seven acres of ground, is painted with Carrara Paint.

From railroad box car to elegantly furnished general offices of the great railways; from plain brick walls and stone fences to tin roofs and interior finish of stately hotels; from country barn or hay shed or cheap outbuilding to farm residence, suburban home or luxurious city residence, Carrara is used because it lasts longer, does not fade, doesn't crack, blister or peel, and covers more surface than the highest priced paints. It cost less than the cheap mixed paints that injure instead of protect. There is but one Carrara. It is made by the Carrara Paint Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, and anyone having a house to paint should send for 50 sample colors, free, of this great paint that has stood the most rigid tests for 25 years, and bear in mind that it is the only paint ever manufactured that is backed by a positive guarantee in every case. God in the Heart and the Home

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

NEARING the close of his life, Moses has something to say to the people of whom he has been the leader for forty years, and so he is delivering to them what has been called "a magnificent series of orations." Imagine the Israelites gathered upon the great

"Thou shalt bind them for a sign on thine hand" plain, four or five miles wide, which lies between the mountains of Moab and the River Jordan, with the city of Jericho in the background. A low spur of the mountain may have been the rostrum from which Moses spoke, or a wooden structure in the midst of the people may have been constructed.

The Leader's Farewell

Moses is about one hundred and twenty years old, and yet there is about him none of the weakness of old age. Instead he is strong and stalwart, for his "natural force" has been preserved by the Lord for the accomplishment of his great task. His eyes are keen and far-seeing, undimmed by age, as he glances over the whole assembly with gleams of tender and personal interest. The people, in turn, look upon him with reverent attention, because of all he has been to them, and knowing that they are soon to see him no more. They hang upon his every word.

Their interest deepens as he talks to them about how they shall serve God in their family life. Each member of the family must love God with all his soul and strength, and he must also have the Word of God in mind and heart. The family religion must be something individual as well as collective. None must be considered too young to share in it. The youngest children must be taught the laws of God, even those who cannot be taught in words, but only by signs of reverence, as the parents point with bowed heads to the name of Jehovah on the small roll containing Deut. 6: 4, 9, 11, 13-21, which they fastened to the door-posts of their houses, called the mezuzah.

And Moses talks with them about how God's laws, and the keeping of them, is to be a frequent subject of talk in their homes, the theme of conversation at all times, even when they are out walking together. And thus it should be that they would not forget the Lord their God, who had brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, and they should be established in his worship, and not liable to be led astray into the worship of the false gods of the people they would find in the land God had promised to give them.

Love the Basis of Law

This was not all Moses had to say, for day after day the people gathered together to hear his farewell discourses, in which he epitomized all the way the Lord had led them, and instructed them from their going out of Egypt until they had come to the very border of the Promised Land.

The two great truths of this lesson are that (1) Love in God is the root of law and (2) Love in us to God and man is the root of free obedience.

"These are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments, which the Lord your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them that it may be well with thee." This refers to the Book of Deuteronomy, made up of the farewell addresses of Moses, in which he repeated and explained a second time the laws he had received from God in Mount Sinai. A single leaf of this book Jesus used three times as a shield to "quench the fiery darts of the adversary" when he was tempted in the wilderness (8: 3; 6: 16; 6: 13). Those verses he had no doubt put in the armory of his memory when a child in Nazareth, to have them ready against the day of need. This book is full of such divine weapons of defense and attack, and should be not only read and studied, but memorized.

Wonderful Memories

This lesson is written in a missionary school for girls in Canton, China, where many of the Chinese girls can repeat the entire New Testament. In childhood and youth not only Scripture verses but hymns should be learned every week, at least one text and one stanza every day, not only to ward off temptation, but for use in helping others in our own homes and elsewhere. We do not always have our Bibles at hand when we need texts. We should "learn them by heart" in the deepest sense of that phrase, and be ready to draw them warm from our hearts for another's need at a moment's notice.

It is "well with thee" to have God's Word in memory, in heart, in life, not alone spiritually but temporally. "That thy days may be prolonged," suggests not only the "eternal life," which whosoever believeth hath even now in its beginnings, but also the longer life in this world which the insurance statistics show is the usual reward of a clean, sober life. Insurance tables re-echo the divine warning that "the wicked shall not live out half their days." Although the sedentary lives of preachers would naturally make them shorter lived than others more active and more out of doors, they rank higher than other insurance risks—even missionaries in tropical countries, where sanitary science is unknown—manifestly because their purer habits more than offset those other unhygienic conditions. Those who restrain passions and appetites, who refuse to weaken and shorten life by the use of narcotics and intoxicants and uncleanness, illustrate the saying that needs to be often repeated, "Self-denial is self-love living for the future." Christian men and women as a rule live longer and stronger and happier lives than others—"all this and heaven too."

"As frontlets between thine eyes"

Pure Monotheism

"The Lord our God is one Lord." This truth, which had to be so often repeated to the Israelites, who, even while God was leading them by a visible pillar of fire and feeding them with daily manna, relapsed into the worship of the Egyptian calf god, is still needed in the twentieth century. Right beside steamboats, railroads and telephones, we have just seen men and women in China burn incense sticks to a dead emperor and to "five hundred genii" about him, which an ingenious moulder has studied to vary, each from every other, in

THE PLAN IS SIMPLE

Every one of these good-looking, comfortable shoes contains a coupon as shown below, good for 5 cents. When the shoes are sold, the dealer removes the coupon and holds it until someone appointed by the local or State Union calls for it. These coupons are sent to the State President, who stamps them and forwards them to the Farmers and Merchants Bank of Lincoln, Neb., who send the money to the proper officials.

Your dealer will gladly carry them in stock if you create a demand.

If your dealer does not carry the shoes, write to the manufacturers and they will send you complete instructions for the opening of a local agency in your community. Remember, it will be a pleasure to wear these shoes yourself and recommend them to your friends, and at the same time every pair contributes 5 Cents to the W.C.T.U. Write for full particulars to ith, whose worshipers are never known ile. Not alone to help the heathen aven do we need to redouble our mis- ry endeavors, but to save them from present miseries of their daily life.

Heathen Suffering

e Son of man is come to seek and to that which is lost." Think of a poor ly, all living in one room on scanty , with scantier clothing, paying thirty rs, one hundred days' wages, prob- all their savings, to Buddhist priests, utter incantations and beat tomtoms one night for the cure of a sick child, he theory that the sickness was due to spirits lingering about their unsanitary e! As morning approached, one of priests walked away, lantern in hand, guide the exorcised devils into a for- er's compound near by, one of many harmless invasions of his premises on e errand. The foreigner was a medi- missionary, from whom we have just rd the story, and whose skilful and free ices had been declined in favor of e priestly frauds, whom some senti- tal Americans suppose are sincere and out "seekers after God." We have ted scores of heathen temples and have rched the faces of the priests for one of aspiration. Appetite, Lust and ed are the trinity whose marks are on ir faces. And the dull faces of the worshipers in these temples make stronger appeal to thoughtful men than the blind eyes and maimed bodies of the most abject beggars. "Give alms of the things that are within."

The Law in the Heart

"These words which I command thee this day shall be in thy heart." The law coming from God's heart was to be received in man's heart. A father's love makes laws or rules to save his child from sorrow. It is easy to show a child that love makes law in the home, and that he should therefore love the law thus made, and the lawgiver. It ought therefore to be easy to teach a child also that the laws of the heavenly Father are made of love; that love and law are but root and fruit. Thou shalt love God, thou shalt love man—on these two loves hangs all law. Such teaching should enable a child to understand how the unknown singer of the longest song in the Bible, the 119th Psalm, could say in many variations,

> Oh, how love I thy law!
> It is my meditation all the day.

Such teaching should show that love is the root of obedience to law in us. George Macdonald says, in words that should be stored in memory: "When God's will is our law, then are we but a kind of noble slaves; but when God's will is our will, then are we his free children." Five times over in his last words, Jesus said, "If a man love me he will keep my words" (John 15). From the root of love to God and man grows the tree whose sap is Christian life, whose branches are the service of man, whose topmost fruit is liberty. Christian life is perfected only when we love what God loves, and hate what God hates, so that what we permit ourselves is what God permits, and what we forbid ourselves is what God forbids. That alone is true liberty, the liberty with which Christ makes us free, the "keys" of liberty, given not to Peter alone, not to apostles only, but to all who really receive Christ in their hearts.

A Wife's Delicacy

Love is more than knowledge, more than words, more than action, and will produce them all. We may lack in judgment, but loving service will be accepted in spite of our mistakes. A man in New York who was supremely devoted to his wife, saw in a store window a dress pattern that he thought would delight his wife, but found it would cost more than he could afford. At last, however, he determined to make a great sacrifice for her sake, and so bought it and brought it to her. It was the color she most abominated and was least suitable, but she knew the loyal love that prompted it, and received it with thanks and no sign of displeasure, trusting to find some way to save him from disappointment.

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." We can obey that command or God would not have given it; and that command means perfect love—not perfect judgment; that is, the command means that among mixed motives the dominant motive should be and may be to please God and do his will.

"Thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children." Many a man may seem to be unmoved by any pleas directed to him personally to open his heart to the workings of the Divine Spirit and begin the consecrated life of the Christian, but ask him what he wants for his children, and a different chord will be struck. He will usually reply that he does not want his children to follow his example. And one of the most effective ways of getting such a man into the kingdom has proved to be an appeal "for the sake of the children."

A Notable Jubilee

Next month the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of its beginning. The fact is intensely significant that in a city so given up to the worship of the golden calf as is New York, a meeting for prayer should have been kept up every day for fifty years. There are evidently Christians in the city who have found it good to seek God and who testify that he does hear and answer prayer.

When I first decided to offer the Basket Washing Machine at $3.50 to the hundreds of thousands of women in America who do the family washing and the washing of other families, I was naturally anxious to know how it would be received—what they would think of it.

"I do not believe there is a better Washing Machine built at any price than the Basket Washer. Yet I am selling it for $3.50."

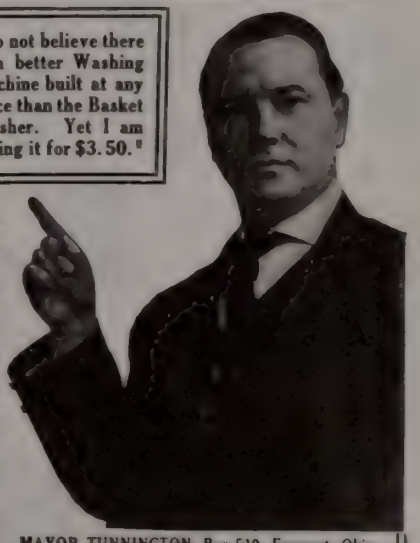
There are many of the machines in use in Fremont, and never has there been the slightest complaint from one of them. I had it built to relieve the burden that my official position showed me rested upon so many women. And it was because of this satisfaction and the boon it was to women that I decided to offer the machine to everyone by starting a national advertising campaign.

I knew my claim for the Washer would be maintained; that it would wash a tub of clothes in less than six minutes, and that it would last for five years, doing a washing every day if necessary.

My first advertisement brought me thousands of inquiries and sales. A first-class Washing Machine at $3.50 had never been heard of before. The price made a hit, and when the machine was received it made a still bigger hit.

I have almost bushels of testimonials from every part of the country. One machine in a new community usually sells a half dozen more. That is what I wanted! I want a Basket Washer in every home in America, and I shall never be satisfied until this is accomplished.

Send me $3.50 and I'll send a Machine at once. You cannot help being pleased; but if you should not, I'll return your money.



AGENTS make from $10.00 to $15.00 per day selling the Basket Washer in their own town. No experience necessary—the machine does the talking and makes the sale.

Questions and Answers

M. J. W., Jaquins, N. Y. Does the statement in Heb. 10: 26, that the man who sins wilfully after receiving knowledge of the truth has nothing before him but the fiery indignation, mean that there is no hope for him?

The words apply to those who wilfully or deliberately continue in sin. There is no further sacrifice than that already made. If he turns away from that and goes back to his sins, what hope can there be, if he wilfully continues in them? He may turn back to the sacrifice he has abjured and then there is hope, but if he is looking for some other way of escape, which will allow him to live in sin, or to some sacrifice availing after death, he has nothing before him but "a certain fearful looking for of judgment," as the writer of the Epistle says.

S. B. H., Kalona, Ia. Who were the Jacobins in the days of Robespierre?

They were a political party which appeared in France during the Revolution and which became decidedly revolutionary after 1791. It had clubs in almost every town and village. Desmoulins, Robespierre, Danton, Marat, Petion and all the noted revolutionary leaders were members. It was guilty of the most frightful excesses in the name of justice, and was the cause of the "reign of terror." On the fall of Robespierre in 1794, the Jacobin movement died.

G. B., Buffalo, N. Y. Is paradise identical with heaven?

The word originally came from the Persian and meant the king's wooded park, an enclosed pleasure ground, well watered and stocked with game. The Hebrews adopted the word and with them it referred primarily to the garden of Eden. Afterward it became spiritualized and stood for the abode of the righteous dead, as contrasted with Gehenna, to which the wicked were sent. They had all kinds of fanciful notions about it, as of its having places for seven orders of the righteous, in accord with the excellence they had respectively attained in their lives. Christ's use of the word to the dying thief (Luke 23: 43), was probably chosen as being suitable to his capacity. It would give him the solace an ignorant man needed and would be an assurance of peace and rest. The thief prayed to be remembered when Christ should come. Christ's promise was better—the thief should be with him that day where Christ was going.

Mrs. ———, Washington, D. C. Will you kindly solve the following problem for me: A cow is tied with a rope one hundred feet long to the corner of a barn twenty-five feet square. How much ground can the cow graze over?

We would be pleased to hear from some of our readers, who may be able to solve this arithmetical puzzle.

G. P., Valencia, Kan. 1. Was Moses justifiable in killing the Egyptian? 2. Why do men swear? 3. Is conscience a true guide?

1. He had provocation, but the act was not justifiable. It was committed in a moment of passion. 2. The use of profanity is a sin and it is both vulgar and wicked. No Christian, and, we might also add, no well-bred person, will swear. 3. Not always. In the case of one who is steeped in wickedness, the conscience may be so deadened that the power to distinguish between right and wrong is almost gone. The conscience needs to be quickened, and this is one of the results of conversion. Paul said he verily thought that he was doing God service when he persecuted the Christians. Thus, you will see, conscience is not always an infallible guide.

Mrs. Mattie C., Groveton, Tex., sends us a note concerning Mrs. L. Killcrease, of Pine Mills, Tex., said to be the oldest living American pioneer. She was born in North Carolina in 1776, and notwithstanding her great age, is in good health.

Reader, Morristown, N. J. Is it a fact that the Department of Agriculture in Washington has officially declared "beer the purest and best of all foods and drinks," as has recently been asserted in many newspapers?

No. The Agricultural Department, in a letter to the Associated Prohibition Press, dated August 9, 1907, says: "No such statement has been made by the Department. I regret that there is no law by which such practices may be reached." There is a good deal of lying, which unfortunately does not come within the category of punishable crimes.

Laying the Foundation-Stone of the Peace Palace at The Hague

THE foundation-stone of the Palace of Peace, now being erected at The Hague, was laid with due solemnity three weeks ago by M. Nelidoff, President of the Peace Conference. The edifice will be the home of the Permanent Court of Arbitration, and is the result of the generosity of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who made a donation of a million and a half dollars for the purpose. His name is inscribed on the foundation-stone. The site on which the building will stand is the gift of the Netherlands Government. The Palace will consist of two stories and a lofty tower. The great meeting hall for the Administrative Council of the Permanent Court will be in the upper story.

FRESH AT NIGHT

If One Uses the Right Kind of Food

If by proper selection of food one can keep strong and fresh at the end of a day's work it is worth while to know the kind of food that will produce this result.

A school teacher of Media, Kan., says in this connection: "I commenced the use of Grape-Nuts food five months ago. At that time my health was so poor that I thought I would have to give up my work altogether. I was rapidly losing in weight, had little appetite, was nervous and sleepless, and experienced, almost constantly, a feeling of exhaustion. I tried various remedies without good results, then I determined to give particular attention to my food, and have learned something of the properties of Grape-Nuts for rebuilding the brain and nerve centres.

"I commenced using that food and have since made a constant and rapid improvement in health in spite of the fact that all this time I have been engaged in the most strenuous and exacting work.

"I gained twelve pounds in weight and have a good appetite, my nerves are steady and I sleep sound. I have such strength and reserve force that I feel almost as strong and fresh at the close of a day's work as at the beginning.

"Before using Grape-Nuts I was troubled much with weak eyes but as my vitality increased my eyes became stronger. I never heard of any food as nutritious and economical as Grape-Nuts." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

OUR MAIL-BAG

Mrs. L. D. P., Chicago. Was Robert Fulton married, and if so, are any of his descendants living?

He was married and at his death left a widow and four children—three daughters and a son. The son, Robert Barlow Fulton, died in 1841. The daughters married and their descendants are doubtless still living in New York and Pennsylvania.

H. W., Golconda, Ill. 1. Was the flood that bore up Noah's ark a salt or fresh water flood? 2. Did it cover the whole earth or only a part? 3. Did the animals confined in the ark require food and drink? 4. Is it probable that many of the large animals now extinct were not confined in the ark?

All that men know on the subject, besides the sacred narrative, is contained in Josephus' Antiquities Chapter III., and in brief extracts from the Greek, Egyptian, Chaldean and Phœnician stories of the flood. These accounts imply that the whole of the then known world was flooded. No details have come down to us concerning the interior management of the ark or as to the various classes of animals it contained. Bishop Stillingfleet, Dr. J. Pye Smith, Le Clerc, Rosenmuller, and other eminent scholars have held that as the object of the Deluge was to sweep man from the earth, it was not necessary that it should extend beyond that region which man inhabited, and only the animals peculiar to that region needed to be preserved. Thus the Flood may have been universal as to mankind, and yet only partial as to the lower creation.

R. E., Reading, Pa. In what way did Abel learn that his offering was accepted, and Cain learn that his was not?

You, like many others who write to THE MAIL-BAG, credit us with a knowledge which no one can possess. We have received no revelation supplementing the Biblical record, and therefore do not know what was the sign of acceptance. You know what was the sign given on Carmel to Elijah (I. Kings 18 : 38), "The fire of the Lord fell and consumed the sacrifice." The sign of the acceptance of Abel's sacrifice may have been the same, but no one can tell you positively.

Mrs. A. W. O., Denver, Colo. Where did the expression "Cleanliness is next to godliness" originate? Is it in the Bible?

No, it is not in the Bible. It is from a Hindu book, the Beraitha, and it is called "the last mishna of Sola."

W. R., Lake Odessa, Mich. Did Moses actually see God as stated in Exodus 33 : 11 and other places in the Bible?

The statement of Jesus that God is a spirit (John 4:24) leads us to believe that what Moses saw was a brilliant glory, in which there was no human likeness. He would naturally speak of seeing God, when he saw the light that was the symbol of the divine presence. His petition in Exodus 33:20 indicates that he had not seen any shape or form. (See I. John 4:12.)

L. P., Kinsman, O. Can you tell me why certain prayers are not answered? The answers to prayer you publish would lead one to believe that prayer is surely answered, yet in two cases in my own experience in which blessings were earnestly sought, they were not granted.

Your experience is that of many. Yet God is not capricious. We are bound to believe in his faithfulness and his love. He has good and wise reasons for withholding the boons sought. We know a case that is the exact counterpart of the first instance you mention. The good man died deeply worried because his prayers had not been answered. He was a very pious man, and had led a blameless life, and he certainly prayed in faith. He could not tell how it was, yet now, forty years after his death, his children know. They see that if God had given him the blessing he sought, a great deal of good which has since come could never have happened. God knows what is best in the long run, and we ought to have sufficient confidence in him to believe that whether he grants or withholds, he is acting wisely and kindly.

Jere B., Milwaukee, Wis. How many judges will compose the proposed Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague?

Eight great Powers will have one judicial representative apiece, appointed for a period of twelve years, and all the other Powers will be fairly represented on the basis of comparative population, industries and commerce.

We Asked a Young Woman To Dress Herself Very Plainly

And go to church, each Sunday to a different church of varying denominations, until she had attended 150 in all, to test two points in church work: First, how much the average sign "Strangers Cordially Welcomed" really meant; second, to what extent the average minister would reach out his hand to her in welcome after service. She went to 150 churches in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, Saint Louis, New England, the middle West and the South. What her experiences were she begins to tell, church by church, in the September Ladies' Home Journal. Thousands will naturally be interested in reading this young woman's experiences in their own particular church, for each church is named.

Gabrielle, the Flower of New Rochelle great leaves, and an exuberance of tropical vegetation everywhere greeted the eye. Amid those terraced plantations stood the houses of the planters, generally built of wood and roofed with red slate, which gave an additional picturesqueness to the scene.

When the transport arrived at Basse-Terre, a throng of planters crowded about her, anxious to obtain engagés, as the convict-slaves were called.

Louis and Francis were assigned to—or more properly speaking, were leased by—M. Gromartin, a sugar planter, who was possessed of many hundred acres of the saccharine herb. He proved, on the whole, rather a humane master, very different from what they had been led to expect; for one of the methods employed to make the unhappy exiles recant was to terrify them with tales of the horrible cruelties they would have to endure on the islands—especially the tale of one brutal planter, who boasted that he had killed three hundred engagés with his own hand—a tale that may well be doubted.

They were held to their tasks, but were neither overworked nor stinted in their food.

But alas for their hopes of escape! They found the laws as stringent, and the shores of the island as closely patrolled, as those of France, lest the slaves should hail some passing vessel and get away; while, of those who tried to make their way through the wilderness, they saw some who had attempted it brought back torn and bleeding from the thorns of the maya and other tropical bushes, or bitten by serpents, or stung by venomous insects.

Their lot on the island was on the whole rather better than in the galleys.

When they had been for about six months on the island, it happened that one of their fellow-slaves, an engagé like themselves, effected his escape by a passing ship, which sent a boat for him in answer to his hail.

By this circumstance Louis was stirred up to fresh endeavor, and even Francis plucked up courage, and began to entertain some glimmerings of hope.

Louis constantly indulged in dreams of the happiness that might yet be in store for him. The few words which Girard had spoken concerning Gabrielle's unalterable constancy were as a balm to his spirit—not that he had ever doubted her; but it is always sweet—is it not?—to receive confirmation even of that which we know full well.

Girard had his dreams also, but so little confidence had he in the success of the undertaking, that they scarcely reached beyond the present moment. "If we come out of it alive, that is all I dare hope for."

They were to start at night, hoping to be far on their way before their flight was discovered.

On the afternoon of the appointed day, as the two were engaged as usual among the sugar-canes, a negro boy, one of M. Gromartin's house-servants, came running up to them.

"Which of you two white fellows is Francis?" he said. "Massa want to see you at the great house right straight off."

"I am Francis. What does your master want of me?"

"Dunno," said the boy, skipping off.

"What does this mean, I wonder? Perhaps they have discovered our project."

"That is not likely."

"I hope there are no ladies at the great house," said Francis, glancing at his soiled and tattered slave-garb, and instinctively trying to smooth his close-cropped hair—at which little involuntary acts his companion smiled furtively.

M. Gromartin's house was a large, roomy, one-storied building, its painted walls and red roof supplying a bright touch of color amid the universal greenery. It was furnished on three sides with shady verandas. A handsome carriage with two spirited horses stood before the door as Francis approached. On the front veranda sat M. Gromartin himself, in company with a dignified elderly gentleman in a splendid military or official costume.

"M. Girard," said M. Gromartin—and Francis started so violently at the unwonted address that he almost fell off the steps—"allow me to have the honor of presenting you to His Excellency, General Montaubin, Governor of the Island of St. Christopher."

In spite of the soil and rags of serfdom, Francis bowed with a grace that would have done honor to the Faubourg St. Germain.

The governor was evidently impressed.

"Young man," said he, "I have great satisfaction in handing you the paper I hold in my hand. It is a free pardon for the offense of which you are accused, obtained from the king by the persistent efforts of your mother, the Countess of Belvoisin."

Francis uttered an inarticulate cry, and turned so pale that the others thought he was about to faint, but, recovering himself, he took the document in his hand, and pressed it to his lips, in a transport of joy.

"O my mother!" he cried. "My dear, blessed mother! May God and the Virgin reward her for her love!"

The General looked surprised at this exclamation.

"Then you do not belong to 'the Religion'?"

"No. I am a good Catholic, but was thought to be too friendly to a member of 'the Religion,' and had to suffer the consequences."

KOREA UNDER JAPANESE RULE

tion in the East. Under Japan's dominatting influence, Korea is no longer prey for the spoiler, and Chinese "concessions" formerly to be had almost for the taking also belong to the past. All these changes are the natural and reasonable consequences of the rise of Japan as a world Power. It is history repeating itself.

Korea has lost her independence. The Powers no longer have legations at Seoul. Japan absolutely controls her external relations and governs her as a protectorate. But it is a question whether, after all, her people will not ultimately be the gainers by the change of masters. The country will be developed, new industries created, and the whole life and spirit of the nation quickened and vitalized. Slow, unprogressive, bound fast to its ancient traditions, Korea was distinctly decadent. The infusion of new life, new interests, new activities may not wholly compensate for the sufferings a country endures while undergoing such a radical change, but who can foresee the outcome? Geographically and in many other respects Korea possesses natural advantages superior to those of the islanders, and there may be in store for her a future far more brilliant than the dull past, even if it does not restore the lost jewel of her independence.

Divine Omniscience*

HOW much time has been wasted by theologians in debating about the omniscience of God, is well known. They have discussed with characteristic acrimony the question whether the universal knowledge God possesses is "all equally present to the divine consciousness, or is latent and only brought up as occasion requires." It is such contention as this that disgusts laymen with religion. It is utterly profitless and moreover cannot be solved. The human mind cannot grasp the divine; if it could, there would be no divinity. As the prophet said: "As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts." "Canst thou by searching find out God?" The earth and human life are full of problems that we have not yet solved, and in studying them we may get light that will be helpful to us. Better that study than that of the nature of God, which must necessarily remain a mystery to us. However, the officers of the Christian Endeavor Society choose the subject rather than the more practical.

Omniscience, then, as defined by the theologians, is that attribute of God by which he knows all things and perceives all things. "It is infinite, eternal, perfect, peculiar to himself and incomprehensible." The plain layman, avoiding these subtleties, recognizes the fact that universal knowledge is essential to the conception of God. We could not imagine a being such as God is, unless we included among his powers that of knowing all about the universe and about his creatures. How he exercises this knowledge and how he maintains it is the mystery that cannot be solved. We are content to accept the fact, because to reject it would require us to abandon our faith in God's existence, or to limit his power.

The impressive fact about the doctrine is its application to ourselves. Our secret sins, our hidden thoughts and motives, are all known to Him. We do not stand before him as one of a huge mass, nor as one of a nation or family, but as individuals; and our heredity, our advantages of education and environment are known to him, and enable him to form a perfectly just judgment on our conduct. We cannot deceive him, as we may our fellow men, by an outward obedience, while the heart is full of unholy desires and passions. He knows us absolutely and as we really are, not only in conduct but in character. This, too, not only in judgment but in approval, so that the man misjudged of the world can look up to him in confidence, saying, "Thou knowest."

A Constant Reader, Maryland. "I know that God answers prayer, as he has answered mine many times. I am still asking him to help me out of a difficulty, where everything seems dark, and I know he will. It is good to think that when we are cast down, a little 'talk with Jesus makes it right, all right.'"

If You Are Deaf—Read This

That "truth is stronger than fiction" is most forcibly illustrated in the case of Mr. Geo. P. Way, for many years the electrical engineer of the Detroit Y.M.C.A., in the accidental discovery he made of a scientific principle, through the application of which his lost hearing was completely restored.

For 25 years Mr. Way was a deaf man, unable to hear his wife's voice across the table, unable to enjoy an active part in social life. For him, as for every deaf person, life was a gloomy individual matter. He was so deaf he could scarcely hear the roar of his engines and dynamos. For ten years he carried an ear trumpet and had tried every device known; had almost constantly been under medical treatment in the vain effort to get back his hearing. To-day he hears perfectly; yet when he removes two tiny devices from his ears, he is quite as badly off as before—he is again deaf. The story of his discovery, which restored his hearing, is remarkable.

As Mr. Way tells it, he was at his post in the dynamo room one day, and as the buzzing in his ears bothered him more than usual, he placed a curiously shaped tuft of waste in his right ear. Immediately—in the midst of the silence that is the misery of one shut off from the sounds of the busy world—there came a crashing sound, and Mr. Way bounded across the room terror stricken. Unconsciously he pulled the tuft of waste from his ear. Instantly he returned to the silence that had enveloped him for years. The sound of the machinery came to him as far away. Then he realized the truth: he had found a scientific principle which would give him back his hearing. For five years he experimented constantly to put his accidental discovery to practical use. He studied the construction of the human ear from every standpoint. At last complete success crowned his efforts. The Way Ear Drum was the result, and it restored his hearing. Others heard of the marvel, and he was overwhelmed with requests for the little devices.

Wealthy business men of Detroit who had known Mr. Way for years, and the marvelous results which his invention had brought, gave him full financial backing, to extend the blessings which his wonderful Ear Drums bring to those who suffer from impaired hearing and deafness. Thousands have been sold in every part of the world, as one pair of the Drums in any locality produces many other sales. Nine persons out of every ten who have used the Way Ear Drums have benefited by them.

The Way Ear Drum is a thoroughly scientific device. It is of peculiar, sensitive material, shaped to exactly fit the opening to the inner ear. It is easily and quickly placed and removed; cannot collapse; is entirely unfelt and unseen; is very durable, and it does bring back the hearing. Don't judge the Way Ear Drum by any other ear device. It is distinctively different in principle. If you are deaf or "hard of hearing," if your hearing is becoming dull, if you have "noises in the head," write a plain letter telling your troubles to Mr. Way. He was deaf himself and knows. He will be honest and frank with you, and will tell you whether the Way Ear Drum will help you. It costs you nothing to find out. Write to-day—to-morrow never comes. Write personally to Geo. P. Way, 900 Majestic Building, Detroit, Mich., U. S. A.

A. C. Leonard INVENTOR LEONARD'S ANTISEPTIC EAR DRUM

I was deaf for thirty-five years

My Ear Drum (which I patented July 3rd, 1906) and my method have restored my hearing. Since I put it on the market last February, it has restored the hearing of hundreds of others, many of whom had given up all hope of ever hearing again. It has also relieved many from distressing head noises. The megaphonic principle and the flat sounding membrane make my drum the most successful device on the market. It is 'Unseen Comfort.' My new method and antiseptic Ear Drum are endorsed by leading physicians. The price is very low. Why not have your hearing restored? Let me write you about it. OUR ROYAL GUEST

WITH booming guns and escorted by naval and military officers, a cordial welcome has been given to Prince Wilhelm of Sweden, who arrived at Norfolk, Va., on August 19. The Prince comes to visit the Jamestown Exposition in response to the President's invitation, and will visit our chief cities during his stay. He is a grandson of King Oscar, who has always been popular here, and is personally revered throughout Europe. The Prince's father is the Crown Prince Gustave, who has occupied his father's place on several occasions during recent years, when illness or need of rest has compelled the aged king to seek temporary retirement.

Prince Wilhelm of Sweden

On his voyage across the Atlantic the Prince, in spite of his royal dignity, took his share of duty. His rank in the Swedish Navy is that of second lieutenant, and the captain of the Fylgia, on which he came, was expressly notified that the young man expected no exemption from the duties of his position. It is only on land that Prince Wilhelm outranks his captain. When the Fylgia steamed into the harbor, a royal salute was given from the forts, and a launch came alongside bearing Mr. Herman Lagercrantz, the Swedish Minister at Washington, the Secretary of the Legation and the Swedish Consul at Norfolk. The young Prince, who is twenty-three years old, and stands six feet three inches high, was conspicuous among the officers on deck, and gave a hearty greeting to his grandfather's representatives. Admiral R. D. Evans, of the American Navy, and Colonel G. F. Harrison, of the Army, welcomed him to the United States. After a brief visit to the Exposition an elaborate repast was spread for the royal guest by the Swedish Consul, at which the officers of the Army and Navy and over a hundred prominent Virginians sat down.

After thoroughly inspecting the Exposition, the Prince's program includes a visit to President Roosevelt at Oyster Bay. Thence he goes to Newport, R. I., where a series of entertainments are planned for him by wealthy citizens. Afterwards the Prince intends to visit Washington, and to pay visits to the navy yards, in which he takes a deep interest. He is known in his own country as the Sailor Prince, and has adopted the sea as a profession. He is betrothed to the Grand Duchess Maria Pavlovna of Russia, a cousin of the Czar.

Bible Knowledge*

NEW light on the Bible has come to this generation to a greater extent than to its immediate predecessors. The patient toil of the higher critics and of the learned Orientalists who have devoted their whole lives to the study of the dates and periods in which the sacred books were written, has enabled us to obtain a better knowledge of the Scriptures than ever before. We know now what was the condition of the people for whom the poets and prophets wrote and can understand why they placed emphasis on certain doctrines and truths that seemed to us unessential. We are enabled to follow the gradual unfolding of revelation and to perceive the cause of statements appearing in one book that seemed to contradict those of an earlier book. The people were learning slowly and God was teaching them gradually and by degrees, as we teach children. Thus the Bible has become a new book to us, more interesting, more intelligible and more helpful than before.

In this work there has been a danger which has been fully realized, and it has brought on the workers an obloquy they have not deserved. The danger is of men getting the idea that the books of the Bible are mere human productions without the authority that was formerly conceded to them. Rash and impulsive readers have said that there is no more spiritual weight in Kings and Chronicles than in Bancroft and Motley, and that the writers in the one case were as liable to err as in the other, and that the Psalms deserve no more attention than Lowell or Whittier. This view excludes inspiration, and undermines the authority of the Bible. A moment's thought would show that the Bible occupies a unique position because the message delivered by the writers was given them by God, and their words are the words of divine wisdom. It is in this fact that the superiority of the Bible consists. There have been more able historians than Samuel, and sweeter poets than David, but the Hebrew has never been superseded, because the divine power was in what they wrote, and their message came from God.

A better era of Bible study is now dawning. We have passed through the storm, and the clouds have cleared. The Bible is dearer to us than ever, because we understand it better. We know that the supernal voice of our Heavenly Father is there, uttering itself through the human instrument, and that the occasional discords are to be attributed to the imperfections of the instrument, and not to the voice that is always loving, and tender, and wise.

Educational Work in Ceylon

PERMIT me to thank you most cordially for publishing an account of Mrs. Rutnam's and my own work in Ceylon, and pointing out the needs of it. Your readers may wish to know a little more particularly exactly what we need for the same. The College costs us about $500 per month, of which nearly $100 goes towards the rent. The old buildings in which the College is located belong to a Mohammedan and are estimated to cost $10,000. During the last ten years of our work we have paid as house rent nearly $10,000, the total value of the buildings, and yet the buildings are not ours. Mrs. Rutnam and I propose to raise $50,000 for putting up buildings in which our college and medical work could be combined. Realizing that the Lord has permitted nearly $60,000 to pass through our hands, we do not hesitate to believe that the Lord will provide this money. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have heard of our work from time to time, and will you be good enough to inform them that you will be glad to acknowledge in your paper any contributions toward the Central College Building Fund. In the Master's service, S. C. R. RUTNAM.

Forgetfulness

By Mrs. M. Baxter

IN Moses' address to his people (Deut. 6: 1), the subject of forgetfulness is pressed again and again upon them by their faithful leader. "Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments or no." What were they to remember? This: "He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee." Suffered thee to hunger that he might feed thee, that thou mightest know his care and his power to care for thee. "He fed thee with manna"—none of man's manufacture—"which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee to know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live." "Remember." "Take heed lest thou forget." Child of God, take heed lest thou forget his deliverances. "Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth [educateth] his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee," in his love.

And then, after telling the people of the good land into which the Lord was on the point of bringing them, Moses says, "When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land which he hath given thee." This is the antidote to forgetfulness. Impossible to forget that which fills our hearts with praise. But beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes—which are never irksome to a thankful heart—lest when thou hast eaten and art full (without thanking the Lord for his good gifts), then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God" (vers. 10-14.) "And it shall be if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God . . . I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish." The changes are rung on the word "forget."

In chapter six, Moses, after having repeated the ten commandments to the people, with a comment on the fourth (Deut. 5: 1-21), and with an address reminding them of the circumstances of the giving of the law—says that these commandments are those which the Lord their God commanded to teach them. And this for two reasons: "That ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it. That thou mightest fear the Lord thy God, to keep all his statutes and his commandments, which I commanded thee." And then there is an addition: "Thou," but not thou only, "thy son, and thy son's son, all the days of thy life, and that thy days may be prolonged." Here is an express promise that he who, with his sons and grandsons, obeys the Lord, shall have a long life; and the answering promise is to the son who obeys his parents, that he shall "dwell long in the land."

And now Moses adds a special exhortation: "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might." How can this be possible? And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart." There was One who said: "I delight to do thy will, O my God; yea, thy law is within my heart" (Ps. 40: 8). We know from Heb. 10: 5-9, who it is that speaks here. And it is our privilege as his disciples, and as the members of his body, to have the law of our God written on our hearts, so that we will nothing else but his will. He has overcome us and united our will with his. And then comes the command to teach them to our children. Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children. We must not forget that we are always teaching.

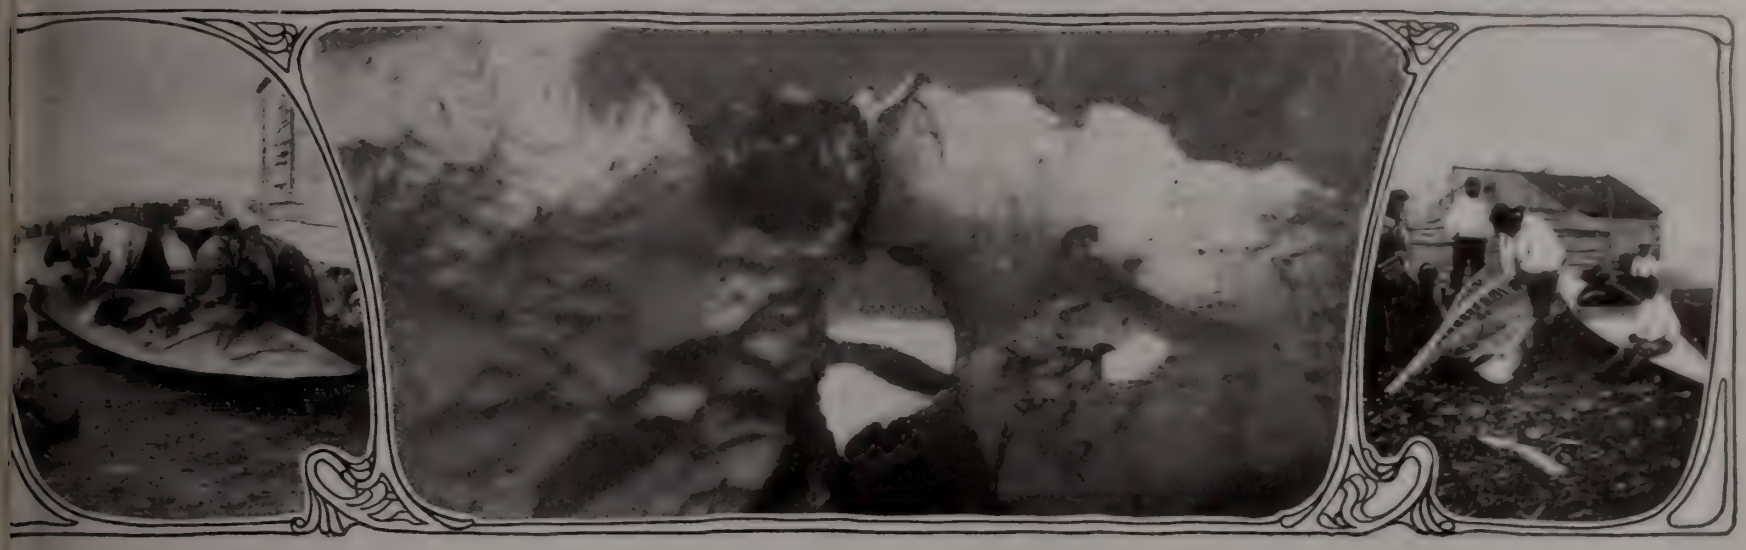
omen Sewing the Skin on a Kayak — Through the Window of the Glacier — Building the Frame of a Kayak



A HAPPY DAY IN THE ARCTIC

T is hard indeed to imagine a land more terribly bleak and forbidding than the Labrador Coast. Their climate they sum up in the grim phrase, "Nine months winter, and three months of bad weather!" Such scattered inhabitants as there are on the northern coast are skin-clad Eskimos, who build queer le houses out of the ever-present ice and snow.

They have a few reindeer and they hunt seals and polar bears for a living. I this terrible wilderness there appeared one day a Hudson Bay steamer which ded two or three energetic white pastors who set themselves first of all to acquire uncouth Eskimo tongue. These pioer heroes lived, like the natives themves, in igloos or half-underground huts de of snow-blocks, with windows of l intestines, and lighted by means of oky little whale-oil lamps. The pastors ught themselves lucky if they got letrs from the outside world once a year; d they had not only to doctor themves when sick, but also every Eskimo n, woman and child for fifty miles ound. In six months or so they had a rking knowledge of that strange lanage, and had already begun to hold vices in the most remarkable chapel on ord.

Let the reader imagine a skeleton structe of whale and walrus ribs, covered er with the skins of the fur seal, quite dressed; windows of semi-transparent estine, and the inevitable smoky and -smelling lamps of walrus oil. A church de of sealskin might be considered fficiently queer; but stranger still was e doom that befell it. That church was rtly eaten by savage Eskimo dogs, ich are always half-starved, and which, that particular season, were so positely ravenous that they began to attack e children. These brutes go hunting in chs like wolves, especially in seasons distress. One night, the white pastors ere awakened by fierce growling and rking. In the darkness they beheld eir low sealskin church overrun by the venous dogs, which were tearing great rips of the rough skin and eating it as ough it were nourishing meat. Running t, the pioneers beat off the pack, but not without sustaining many severe bites. ext day the church was found to be so seriously wrecked by the night assault at it was thought the time had come to order a more substantial structure from urope.

The missionaries belonged to the Moravian body, with their principal station Makkovik, Northern Labrador. They wrote to their headquarters in Hamburg, plaining that the local Eskimos had set aside certain reindeer and furs, which are the moneys of their country, in order to pay for the church structure, which they were looking forward to almost as though it were something from another planet. The Hamburg headquarters placed the order at Niesky, in Prussia, and the church was quickly built of oak and pine framework, in numbered sections. It was set up at Niesky several times, and then the sections were carefully checked and put aside for shipment in such a way that there could be no mistake.

In due time the sections were loaded upon the deck of a steamer, and taken to Hudson Bay. Here the church was transferred to a little trading schooner, the sections being handled as carefully as though they were some puzzle made of building blocks. For many months the Eskimos of Makkovik had been expecting the schooner. When at length her snowy sails were seen, and the makings of their church loomed high upon her deck, they were greatly excited. Hundreds of men got out their kayaks, or skin boats, and paddled out among the ice floes to meet the vessel. They swarmed over her when she cast anchor, each being anxious to bear his share of the burden.

Eskimos Ready to Start for a Hunting Expedition

In less than three hours the big framework had been floated ashore, and the pieces were arranged on a great expanse of icy moss, numbered in order—one, two, three, and so on. Like delighted children, pastors and people now began to uprear the skeleton, and in less than two days it was complete. Meanwhile, enormous rolls of felt had likewise been landed for the roofing and lining of this strangest of sacred structures. In less than a week it was ready for consecration and the inaugural service.

On the day the first service was held, Dr. Grenfell's hospital ship Strathcona entered the little bay, and her skipper-physician landed to witness one of the strangest and most impressive ceremonies he had ever beheld in those Arctic wilds. The church was warmed with whale-oil stoves and was perfectly comfortable, even with the thermometer sixty degrees below zero outside. Strangest episode of all was the collection at the opening service. The Eskimos came forward with their most treasured possessions. Thus the wonderful church that had come to them across the great ocean was half filled with valuable seal furs, masses of frozen meat, tusks of walrus and narwhal, superb pelts of the great polar bear, and hundreds of gallons of whale and walrus oil, done up in skin sacks. And the little men lifted up their shrill voices in thanksgiving, making that inaugural service the strangest that even the most remote Arctic mission station had ever beheld.

Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D.*

A Cheerful Faith

TEXT—Phil. 2: 17, 18

"I joy and rejoice with you all. For this same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me"

IN this simple sentence is the innermost essence of Paul's letter to the Philippians. It is not often that you can condense in a single sentence the gist of one of Paul's letters, but this can be done in the present case. Half of his letter is taken up with this declaration: "I joy and rejoice," and the other half is full of exhortation: "Joy ye, and rejoice ye with me." It is the happiest of all St. Paul's epistles. It bubbles with hallelujahs, it runs over with hosannas. "Rejoice in the Lord," he cries; "rejoice in the Lord always; again I will say, rejoice." To say this over and over again is not irksome for me, and it is a good thing for you to hear it.

There must have been some reason why St. Paul poured himself with such enthusiasm into this exhortation. The church in Philippi had fallen on evil days. It was a small church situated in and wickedness. Philippi was an opulent commercial centre through which the tides of traffic flowed east and west and west and east. Here pleasure had built her palaces, and superstition had made her home; and in the midst of it all there stood this little Christian community—very small and very feeble, lifting up its protest against the overwhelming forces of the antagonistic world. Many a time it seemed as though the contest was absolutely hopeless. Again and again the Christians felt that the new religion would be swept away. All around the church its enemies had gathered. There were caricatures of Christianity afloat, and exaggerations and counterfeits. Christianity is easily caricatured and readily counterfeited. From the very beginning until the present hour the counterfeits and exaggerations have been numberless. Religions have passed themselves off as Christianity out of which cardinal things have been dropped, and other religions have paraded as Christianity to which have been attached teachings which Christianity does not sanction.

Moreover, the founder of the Philippian church is seven hundred miles away and in prison. The chances are he will never get out of prison alive. He is the prisoner of Nero, one of the bloodiest tyrants on the earth; and the hearts of the Philippian Christians sink within them as they think that possibly never again will they hear the burning words of the teacher to whom they owe their salvation. Moreover, Epaphroditus has been taken from them. He is also seven hundred miles away and has been lying at the point of death. The most distressing rumors have reached them again and again, and they have given up all hope concerning him. Paul knows something of the anxiety and alarm into which his Philippian converts have been thrown. While he writes he sees their drooping heads and catches glimpses of their despondent faces; and that is why he calls out again and again: "Rejoice, O Philippians; rejoice in the Lord always; again I say, rejoice."

A Happy Man

But how can Paul say this unless he is full of joy himself? A man cannot make other people happy unless he has some happiness of his own. It is impossible to lift people to a higher plane than that on which we ourselves are living, and no man can give another man that which he himself does not possess. Is Paul able to exhort his friends to be joyful because he has so much happiness of his own? The answer is, Yes. He is full of joy. He overflows with gladness. "I joy and rejoice with you all." That is his repeated declaration. And upon this declaration it is worth our while to meditate.

It is most astounding that this man should be so full of joy. He is in prison; he is suffering one of the mightiest disappointments of his life. For years he had dreamed of seeing Rome. He had seen Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and Athens, but had never yet seen the metropolis of the world. He kept saying to himself for years, "I must see that city, too." For Rome was the centre of the world, and the Gospel pebble dropped into the great ocean of human life in Rome would send its ripples to the farthest shore. Rome was the top of the world, and if a man could stand on that dizzy height and speak a message his voice would go rolling down the great world's slopes into the ears of men everywhere. Every city was to Paul like a silver trumpet through which a message might be blown, but Rome was the greatest of all the trumpets; and if he could only put this trumpet to his lips he would awaken echoes in the hearts of men everywhere—and so for years he had set his heart on Rome.

In his dreams he saw himself passing from synagogue to synagogue telling his countrymen how Jesus Christ had died and risen again. He pictured himself preaching to the little Christian church in the city on the Tiber, stirring them by the same Gospel with which he had inspired the churches in Asia Minor. This was his dream—and at last God permits him to see the great metropolis; but, alas! not in the manner in which it had all been pictured in Paul's dreams. He had seen himself going into the city with the stride of a conqueror, enjoying the privileges of a free man; but instead of that he goes into the city a prisoner chained to a soldier, and is thrust into a prison out of which there is little likelihood of making his escape. The synagogues cannot be visited, the Christian church cannot be preached to. The dream of Paul's life has come to nothing. Oh, how frequently our most glittering dreams turn out exactly as St. Paul's did! The thing which comes to pass is the very thing we did not want. But, nevertheless, Paul is not disconcerted. He simply overflows with joy.

A Desire Strangely Fulfilled

His dream has not been fulfilled in the precise way in which he had wished it, but his deepest wish is being realized. His desire in coming to Rome had not been to see the city. He knew nothing of the modern globe-trotter's itch and insatiable curiosity to see the sights and to drink in the sounds of new communities. His desire to go to Rome was in order that he might preach the Gospel there. He cared nothing for its streets and mansions, its statues and its monumental arches; he was interested simply in the Gospel, and Rome to him was nothing more than an opportunity to give the message which the Son of God had given to him. And now that he is in Rome, although he is a prisoner, he has found that the Gospel of the Son of God is running fast and being glorified. His very bonds have worked together for his good; the chain by which he is made fast has lifted him to a prominence he could never have had without it. Because he is a prisoner he is getting closer to the Emperor than a free man could ever have gotten. By being bound every day to a different Roman soldier, he is enabled to reach the very men who live in the palace of the Cæsars. These soldiers are picked men, and they are chained one after another to the apostle's wrist; and whether they will or not they must feel his spirit and get an idea of the kind of man this foreign Jew really is. "Why, all this is working out," he shouts in ecstasy, "for the furtherance of the Gospel. My very bonds have proved to be a blessing, and the Gospel spirit is pervading the great household in which Cæsar himself lives."

Contagious Heroism

And not only is the effect good upon the Romans, but it is also good upon the Christian church itself. Roman Christians have been timid; they have been afraid of Cæsar; they have not dared to hold up their heads or speak aloud; but now, inspired by Paul's example, they are getting brave, and are not afraid to stand up and profess their faith in the crucified Galilean. There is nothing so contagious as heroism, nothing so catching as good cheer. A heroic soul radiates vitality and hope into all the souls that are round about it; and Paul, although a prisoner in one of Nero's prisons, bound to the wrist of a Roman soldier, radiates the very life of God into his fellow Christians in the Roman church, as well as into the hearts of the soldiers who form the body guard of the mightiest king in the world. "I joy and rejoice with you all," he says, as he thinks how the Gospel is making progress in spite of every obstacle.

But Paul has harder things to bear than his imprisonment. The jailer did not hurt Paul so deeply as other men in Rome. There were men in Rome had an imperfect apprehension of Christianity, they did not like Paul. Paul was keen-eyed, understood what Christianity involves. He that it is the most radical of all religions; when ried out it turns this world upside down. He saw as very few men have ever seen it. He knew that religion of Jesus is the most revolutionary of all ligions; and because he saw this and declared it, he suspected and feared and hated. All around him conservative men who wanted to accept a part of C tianity, but not all. They bound it round with traditions of the past. They hated Paul as they followed him on his travels from city to spreading false reports about him and his work; now that he is safe in prison their exultation knows bounds. "He is caught at last," they cry out in g "now is our chance to bring our gospel on to triump Theirs was an imperfect form of teaching, and t motives were not high. Paul could hear their deri laughter through the grating of his prison window. could hear in imagination the mangled interpretat of Christianity being preached to men who suppo they were getting the full rounded truth. How Paul bear this catastrophe? Listen to him: "I and rejoice because Christ is being preached; and I sure that all this, however dark it seems, will turn my salvation through your prayers."

What a different spirit this is from that which n of us possess! We want the thing to be done in way; we want it to be done in the right way. If thing is not done in the right way we do not wan done at all. If Christianity is to be taught we wan to be taught correctly. If the church of God is exist we want it to exist in the right form. If thi do not go full-toned and full-orbed, according to conception, we are distressed and overwhelmed. Paul is a man of different spirit; he is a philosop a saint; he is a man of wide vision, and he cannot upset by what men may do. This man believes in truth; he believes that when truth and error conte for the mastery, truth triumphs. If in any v whatsoever the name of Jesus could be brought men's attention, they would begin to ask, Who is Where did he live? What did he teach? What came of him? And these questions would lead to s other questions; and thus, no matter how low the m tives or how imperfect the teaching, souls would co sooner or later into the light.

Truth Obscured

Have you ever seen the clouds gather themsel together on a summer afternoon, saying to themselv "We will put out the sun"? I have seen them m themselves in great black mountains before his face ur his glory was quite extinguished and darkness lay acr the earth—and then, in the very hour when victo seemed to be complete, I have heard the sun laugh he burst through all the black embankments and flood the world once more with his glory. Just so it is with me they may gather themselves together and say, "We w put out the light of truth." But they imagine a va thing. What is a man's life? It is but a vapor th appears for a little time and then vanishes away. Ha you ever seen a vapor float between you and the sun That is the picture of the life of a man. It exists b for a moment and then it is gone. Men live their liv and pass away, but the truth of God shines on forev A man standing on the street at noon smoking his cig may enshroud his own head in tobacco smoke, but produces no effect upon the sun. These little mistak men who taught their mangled gospel all around Paul's prison filled the air with their darkened teachin but the Sun of Righteousness kept right on shining, a when Paul looked out of his prison window he did n see the darkened vapor; he saw the great world lying a flood of golden glory. "I joy and rejoice with y all," he cried, "because the name of Jesus is bei brought to the ears of men."

A North Dakota Immigrant Farmer's Sod House

Where Many Nationalities Worship

IMMIGRANTS AND THE NORTHWEST

N discussions of the immigration question, the statement is sometimes made that the immigrants of to-day are "undesirable," because they come almost exclusively from Austria, Poland, Russia, umania, and Italy, and that these immigrants are inferior to the settlers of former years, who came m Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, Germany, etc.

Is this statement true? Is our country in danger cause we admit men and women from very land and m every clime?

Some weeks ago I went to Ellis Island, and saw ,000 immigrants who had arrived in New York that y. When I compared them with the immigrants of rty years ago, I found that they contrasted favorably th the arrivals of the past.

Recently I went to the great Northwest to visit the eat settlements on the prairies of Minnesota and the kotas. Last year I had seen the wonderful development of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta in Canda, wrought especially by immigrants from Russia. ter living with these people, and becoming intimately quainted with them in their church and home life, I aise God for all I have seen and heard, and see no ason for alarm.

It is strange to see Jews from Russia, Syrians from sia Minor, Germans, Roumanians, Russians, Norweans, Swedes, Hollanders, Americans, Irishmen and hers, with a sprinkling of Chinamen and Japanese, l co-operating to make our great Northwest the finest untry on the face of the earth.

See them begin life on a claim or a homestead. The ussians and others build sod houses. The prairie is plowed, and the sods are built up to make walls. Old timbers and scrub wood are built into the roofs, and these too are covered with sods. One can build a good-sized house for about $25. Stables are built of the same material. These houses make good homes. They are warm in winter, and cool in summer. The inside walls are papered, and the houses are quite cosy.

While the people are willing to live in these poor houses, they always try to build good churches. The finest houses one finds on the prairies are the houses for the worship of God. The schoolhouse often stands alongside of the church. The young boys and girls are very anxious to get an American education. Young, enthusiastic missionaries are at work everywhere, and, religiously, the immigrants are better looked after than the people in many of our cities. It is true, the ministers at times have to live in very cramped quarters. The Presbyterian manse in Wishek, N. D., is not very large, having only two very small rooms, the bedroom, study, and parlor all being contained in a room about eight feet square, and the kitchen, pantry, dining-room, etc., in the other room, also eight feet square; but the young enthusiastic pastor and his wife are very happy.

Raum ist in der kleinsten Huette
Fuer ein gluecklich liebend Paar.'

(There is room in the smallest cottage
For a happy, loving pair.)

About twenty years ago I became intimately acquainted with the Mennonites from Russia. These good people originally started from Holland, settled in the Baltic provinces of Prussia, and then went to the south of Russia, and from there came to America. They certainly are desirable immigrants. In the Dakotas I found many thousands of another class of German-Russian-Americans. Their ancestors came principally from Wurtemburg. In Russia they changed the steppes into fruitful farms, and now they are settling our great Northwest.

God's plans for our country are wonderfully glorious and gloriously wonderful. Praise him for the immigrants of to-day. Our great Northwest needs millions more of them.

There is another reason why Paul might have been spondent. He is a prisoner of Nero, the bloodiest rant on the earth; a man who cuts off the heads of omen as well as men, of friends as well as foes, without mpunction; who has degenerated into a monster and kes delight in killing men as wicked boys kill flies. aul knows that any day he may be led out to the exeutioner's block; the shadow of death is on him; the ssibility of dying is always before him. But looking eath full in the face, he says, "I joy and rejoice with ou all. I hardly know which I would rather do—pass to the next world or remain in this one. I am in a rait betwixt the two. It is a glorious thing to go into he next world, and it is a glorious thing to stay here; I hardly know which is the more glorious. If I go into he next world I shall be with Christ, and therefore I nall know more than I know now." We are with Christ n this world, but in the next world we shall be with him n another sense. Death will introduce us into experinces that we cannot have here, and will bring us raptures which we have never known. In that world we shall ee, as we cannot see now, just why we were created and what our life all means. In that world we shall know, s we cannot know here, what God's plan for us really s and what will be the ultimate outcome of all the truggle and all the striving.

"When I think of that I want to go," says Paul; "but when I think of you and think how much you need me; nd when I think of all the other Christians and how nuch service I may be to them, then I think what a glorious world this is, and I wish to stay where I am." Can you conceive of a world finer than this for a man who really wants to serve? What world could give more opportunities for the right use of money than this world? and what world can furnish more chances for the right use of talent than this world? If a man wants to show pity what world could give him more room in which to show it? If a man wants to lift others, what world would furnish him a greater inducement? For any man who has in him the desire to work, this is a superlatively glorious world; for any man who has in him the desire to know what God is and what the soul is and what life is for, the next world is superlatively glorious. Paul had the two desires mighty within him, the desire to know and the desire to serve; and his great soul was poised between the two. "I think on the whole I would rather go, and yet when I see how my service is needed I feel convinced God will allow me to stay." This is the man who one day shouted to the Corinthians: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" He could shout this word of defiance because the horror of death had been completely taken away. The present was so glorious and the future was so glorious that no matter whether he was in this world or the next his soul would rejoice.

What has brought Paul into such an exultant mood? Thinking about his friends. It is wonderful the effect which a pleasant thought has upon the mind. Have you never wakened to the fact that you were miserable, and that all the sky was clouded and all the future dreary? I have had that experience more than once; and on trying to ascertain the cause of it I have discovered that I had been thinking some time before about something exceedingly disagreeable. I had then tossed it, as I thought, from my mind—but I had not succeeded; it was in me yet and was working like a poison until by and by the poison found its way through every vein and artery of my soul. One disagreeable thought kept in the mind is sufficient to darken the heavens and rob existence of its glory.

And how oftentimes we have noticed that life has grown strangely beautiful, the world has shone and sparkled, the minutes have sung as they hurried by us; and all because we have been thinking about something pleasant. Paul has been thinking about the Philippians. They are his dearest friends; they love him; and every time he thinks about them his heart begins to sing. They were the first people he had met in Europe; they had given him a hospitable reception. When they left him they did not forget him, but they sent messengers after him; they kept their eye upon him no matter where he was. They sent gifts to him—three hundred miles, five hundred miles, seven hundred miles—their love was unceasing, beautiful, overwhelming. Paul appreciated such affection because he had none too much of it. When he became a Christian it was necessary to separate himself from his father and mother, his brothers and sisters, and most of his countrymen. He was a vagabond, a traitor; wherever he had gone he had been hated, misrepresented, maligned—but these dear people in Philippi believed in him, loved him, showed their affection by showering upon him their benefactions. To think of them therefore was a delight.

And so upon this little church in Philippi he pours the full wealth of his gratitude and affection. He cannot find words sufficiently strong with which to express his esteem and devotion. "You are my joy, my crown," he cries in a transport of rapture. Is not this remarkable, such language from such a man to such a church? Paul had been a bigoted Jew, a stubborn and prejudiced Jew, a member of the most exclusive of all the Jewish parties, and upon the Gentiles he had once looked down with hatred and contempt. But now he is writing a love-letter to a group of European Gentiles, among whom there is a Roman jailer and a Greek girl that had been a slave. It is to these he says, "You are my joy and my crown." Bigotry has gone and prejudice is dead; this man is a new man; how can you account for it? He has met Jesus the Lord of love, and has entered into the power of his resurrection. And that is why all of his letter is filled with Jesus. The sweetest thing he can say at the beginning is: "Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ," and the sweetest thing he can say at the end is: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit."

A DISTINGUISHED ECCLESIASTICAL GUEST

AMONG the distinguished visitors expected here this fall is the famous Bishop of London, whose personal character, no less than his exalted position, will commend him to the American people. He is a member of the House of Peers, ranking above a baron, yet he is the companion and friend of the poorest men in London, and is not above associating with men who are not strangers to the inner walls of the penitentiary. He is what is known as a "high churchman," and like most members of his party he is a practical philanthropist, devoted to the uplift of the poor. He certainly will be at the great day among that company to whom Christ will say: "I was hungry and ye fed me; I was sick and in prison and ye ministered unto me."

The Right Rev. A. F. Winnington Ingram is one of the youngest bishops on the bench. He is only forty-nine years of age, and is full of vigor and energy. Educated at Marlborough School and Oxford University, he served in various city churches until 1888, when he was appointed "head-worker" in the University Settlement which Oxford supports at Bethnal Green, one of the very poorest districts in all London. No better man could have been chosen for the work. Dr. Ingram loves the people of the slums, and, like his Master, the common people hear him gladly. He studied their lives, was a welcome visitor in their homes, and a cheerful and hospitable entertainer at the Settlement. He organized clubs of various kinds, paying special attention to athletic exercises, which he regards as the best antidote to dissipation. One of the clubs, commonly called the "Blackguards' Club," was organized for a special class, of whom, unhappily, there are many eligible members in that district. The necessary qualification for entrance is that the candidate must have served a term in prison. The elevating and refining work in this club, to which Dr. Ingram gave special attention, is so effective that the members soon qualify for promotion to the other clubs.

By every means that he could devise he sought to purify the lives of the people and to lighten their burdens. He championed their cause in the press, insisted on the enforcement of the laws protecting them from the rapacity of cruel house-owners, and fought their battles against conscienceless corporations which tried to oppress them. The people soon came to recognize him as their friend, to seek his advice in their difficulties, and to give him their unbounded devotion and confidence. One incident which Dr. Ingram himself related in an attack on the company that supplies the East End with water, sheds a light on his own character. He described a visit he was paying to a fever-stricken girl in a stifling garret on one of the hottest days in August. The poor girl craved a little water to moisten her parched lips. Dr. Ingram found that the water company had shut off the supply. There was no one in the house who could be sent, so he walked half a mile to his own home to get the water for her. A man who would do a thing like that is a true follower of Christ, and has in him the right metal for a bishop.

But with all this concern for their temporal welfare, the people were never suffered to forget that the c of Dr. Ingram's chief concern was the salvation of souls. On Sunday afternoon he might be seen m ing to the Park, which is the favorite loafing pla the denizens of the Eastern District. There, soci atheists and political demagogues are wont to hara the people. Dr. Ingram, mounted on a stool, v begin a discourse defending Christianity from attacks of the other speakers. His ready wit, his dotes, and his earnest speech soon drew crowds. was always willing to answer questions, the des speakers would often join the crowd around him try to disconcert him; but his frankness, his uni courtesy and his telling replies always elicited the ion that "the parson had the best of the argume Every summer he has kept up this work, and has a host of the non-churchgoing people to the f and among them not a few of his rival orators in Park.

In 1895 Dr. Ingram was made rector of a churc the neighborhood, but he refused to accept it unles could continue his work at the Settlement. This co tion was granted, and he continued to reside in humble quarters, while turning the commodious rec over to the occupation of the workers of the pa Two years later he was appointed an assistant bis but he continued his superintendence of his bel mission in addition to the work of the bishopric. In higher office he was later called to fill, his thoughts still with his poor people. He wanted to rent the m nificent palace which is at his disposal, and turn proceeds over to the maintenance of the work in w he has been so long engaged, but that project, he lear would not be in accord with the law. He said, to taking his leave of his old friends, that now he ride in a carriage; but if any of them saw him ri alone he hoped that they would do him the fav entering the carriage and bearing him company. a remarkable fact that, although he is identified the high church clergy, there are many of the Evan icals among his intimate friends, and they cordially operate in his philanthropic work.

The Bishop is the author of several religious w which have had a wide circulation. Among them Christian Work in Great Cities; The Men Who Cr Christ, and The Banners of the Christian Faith. T is not in the English Church any prelate more bel by the masses and by the officiating clergy.

WAGON-TOURS AMONG THE MORMONS

TWELVE missionaries, representing seven Christian denominations, during the past year have covered in all more than 4,500 miles of Utah and Idaho in canvas-covered wagons, and carried the Gospel to the homes of 65,000 Mormons. It was the most successful year in the work of the Utah Gospel Mission.

The headquarters of this work are at Cleveland, Ohio. Rev. J. D. Nutting, for six years a pastor in Salt Lake City, is its founder and general secretary. On its advisory committee appear the names of many of the most prominent clergymen of the United States. By the evangelical churches of Utah it is recognized as the most efficient agency for reaching the Mormons, especially those of the inland districts of that State.

Mormonism is spreading all the time into new territory. Idaho is filled with Mormon settlements, and Star Valley, Wyo., is another important field for the anti-Mormon missionaries. Mormon elders are simultaneously in nearly every State in the Union. In New York State at one time, within the last three years, there were more than a score of Mormon elders at work.

It is estimated that only one in fifty Mormons of Utah and Idaho ever enter a church of another denomination. The importance of colporteur work and of the Gospel wagons is therefore at once apparent. The smaller towns offer a particularly good field. In Utah, eastern Idaho, and western Wyoming, there are 400 places or settlements practically destitute of evangelical services, except as they are visited by the missionaries of the Utah Gospel Mission. In early summer the Gospel wagons begin their campaign in Idaho. By November 1 they are headed into northern Utah and move southward with the advance of winter. Last year was the first time Wyoming was reached, this being made possible by the addition of another wagon and more missionaries. Still another wagon is to be added soon; but the chief need of the work at present is more volunteers to carry the Gospel message.

SOUL-SAVING AT CONEY ISLAND

BY far the most important branch of work under the auspices of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society during the summer season is that at Coney Island. When it is considered that the bulk of the evangelistic work at the island resort is performed by two men, the magnitude of it is really surprising.

During the summer of 1906, the work was carried on by the late Major Fred Gardner and his co-worker and fellow, Evangelist T. C. Roberts-Horsfield. The death of Major Gardner was a blow that was keenly felt by the Society. In seeking for a successor to Major Gardner, the Society decided upon the Rev. Robert Rein, who is this year associated with Mr. Horsfield. Although their activities did not begin this year until Decoration Day, they have already seen much good as the result of their efforts.

"There is no doubt that Coney Island offers during the summer season the greatest opportunities for evangelistic effort of any place in the Greater City. With this fact in view, the Society planned the most extensive campaign ever undertaken on the Island. On Sundays regular services are held from 11 A.M. to 12 M. in the theatre in Luna Park, through the courtesy of William McClelland, manager of the Park. Also, through the kindness of Miller Brothers, services are conducted on 101 Ranch, Brighton Beach, among the cowboys and Indians. This arrangement enables the employees of both Luna Park and the Wild West Show to attend a regular Gospel service on the Sabbath day.

"There are scores, yes, hundreds of boys and men who need spiritual attention. Of the men, fully sixty per cent. are of the "down-and-out" class, and they need prompt and efficient help to keep them out of the gutter. One lad had stolen his father's watch and pawned it to secure money with which to "do" the Island. He had spent all the money before he realized the enormity of his offense; but he happened to drift into one of the meetings, where, overcome by repentance, he made a clean breast of his guilt. The worker took care of the lad over night, and next day communicated with his parents, who came for him, forgave him and took him home.

As may be readily believed, the drink habit has brought a majority of the men who seek Gospel aid to the level where the workers find them. It is often possible to help such men to regain their own manhood and self-respect. The case of a man who came to the workers after a Monday night meeting is in point. He was a skilled mechanic employed in Cramp's shipyards, Philadelphia. He had been on a prolonged debauch and, perhaps with no especial destination in view, he drifted to Coney Island, leaving his wife and children in the Quaker City. He was penitent and anxious for a chance to do better, so the worker sent him to the City Mission Hotel and secured employment for him. He communicated with his family, and now there is a prospect that he will be able to return to his old position in the shipyards, and he will no doubt profit by the lesson he has received.

Especial attention is paid by the Society to rescue work among the wayward young women and girls who annually drift to the Island in great numbers. This work is in the charge of Mrs. A. Watt, an efficient and unselfish Mission worker. She attends the Gospel meetings, and hardly a day passes without her being able to lend a helping hand to some unfortunate one of her own sex who has possibly felt a good home for the allurements of the resort and who has become stranded. Not long ago a handsome young woman came to one of the meetings. She had been in the Bowery dives for nearly a week and was in bad condition, mentally and physically. She was attracted to the Gospel service by hearing a hymn she had learned when a girl in Sunday School. She told Mrs. Watt that she was married, but had separated from her husband, owing to her intemperate habits. Mrs. Watt took the penitent woman to her own home and cared for her as a sister. She communicated with the woman's husband, who came to his wife as soon as he received the communication. There were tears, forgiveness, and an affecting reconciliation. They left Coney Island together, and when heard of, they were living decent Christian lives.

The great work thus far accomplished is as follows: More than 100,000 people have listened to the Gospel message, over 500 have professed conversion, and 1,520 have made requests for prayer. The Society is now endeavoring to raise a fund of $50,000 to erect an auditorium to seat from three to five thousand people in the heart of Coney Island, where Gospel services can be held nightly. One gentleman, knowing of the project, has promised to contribute a substantial sum towards the new undertaking.

The Coney Island evangelists, during the fall and winter months, will accept engagements in conducting evangelistic services, including workshop and factory noon-hour meetings. The headquarters of the Brooklyn City Mission and Tract Society are at No. 215 Montague Street, Brooklyn. Subscriptions and donations for the Coney Island work may be sent to Mr. H. E. Nitchie, Treasurer of the Society.

A BIBLE CLASS FOR BUSY WORKERS

ON Sunday morning, October 4, 1903, a little group of men gathered in a room attached to St. Paul's United Brethren Church at Hagerstown, Md. They had come in response to a call for the organization of a Bible class for men. At that first meeting seven names were enrolled and the work then begun with earnest prayer and consecrated effort has multiplied and expanded in a most marvelous manner.

"Our class grew steadily for the next two years. Then it began to increase by leaps and bounds, until now we have an enrolment of one hundred and fifty-three men in the class. They are all busy men—the kind that work during the week—and they also work on Sunday, in the spiritual sense; hence the wonderful success of this great class of Sunday School men.

"Their unusually earnest work and increased membership have caused the entire Sunday School of this church to take on new life. The school now has a number of large classes of zealous workers. At the time the men's class was organized, the school numbered about one hundred and ninety. Now it has a membership of about eight hundred. The members of this men's Bible class range in ages from twenty-five years to eighty-six years, most of them being between the ages of forty and fifty. The teacher of the class is the pastor, Rev. Arthur B. Statton, who has held his present appointment about ten years. The officers are David L. Buchanan, president; Webster H. Wyand, secretary and treasurer; William H. Clipp, assistant secretary; Francis E. Renner, librarian; Joseph Davis, assistant; John R. Schindell, chairman 'look-out committee'; and D. Lincoln Ely, chairman finance committee."

The Famous Hagerstown "Men's Bible Class"

The men of this Bible class are not ashamed of their religion. They freely tell other men what they are doing in Sunday School work, and are always ready to write to any outside inquirers who may wish to learn the way of salvation or to begin practical Christian work.

They try, in every way, to carry the principles of Christianity into their everyday lives, and do not confine their religion to one day in the week, but make it a faith to live and work by. In this manner, and by earnest, united effort, they are exerting a potent and beneficent Gospel influence throughout a very large neighborhood.

A Jubilee of Prayer

THERE will be celebrated in a few days one of the most significant anniversaries of our time. It was fifty years ago that Mr. Lanphier, a humble city missionary, established the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, which in a short time became famous throughout our land and across the Atlantic. It was a bold idea to expect that business men in New York would leave their desks and counters at mid-day for a season of prayer. But the room was filled. Men found their way thither, when anxiety pressed, when there was trouble in the home, when a friend or relative lay sick, and found in that room relief from their burdens. Apart from the hope that the prayers there offered would be answered, there came into the perturbed soul that faith and rest which could say, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt." How many anxious, troubled hearts found in that room the calm confidence for which they longed none can say. The testimonies to answered prayers, too, were carefully preserved, and they fill many volumes.

It is fifty years since that meeting began, and every day since then the voice of prayer has gone up to God in the noon hour. It is well that the jubilee should be observed. It is a testimony to the belief in God as the hearer and answerer of prayer that should not be overlooked. There is great wickedness in the city; many of its citizens have no thought of God in their hearts; the worship of the mighty dollar absorbs all the energies of many lives; but here is a conspicuous testimony that in the busiest haunts of traffic there are some hearts in which the faith in God still lives. In this age of materialism and in the very centre of the race for wealth, there are found some who testify that it has been good to seek after God. "Ye are the salt of the earth," Christ said, and it is in such a meeting as this that the salt of the city is found—the remnant spoken of by the prophets, which is the hope of the people.

Trades Schools Here and Abroad

WE lately had occasion to refer to the important and helpful investigation conducted by the Massachusetts Commission on Industrial Education, in quest of material for which the Commissioners visited all the leading countries of the Old World. Everywhere they found industrial schools regarded with favor. In England, such schools receive national subsidies. London, Liverpool and Manchester are all well provided with trades schools that afford to the children of the working classes an opportunity for elementary or advanced industrial education.

In France they visited the great technical schools of Paris, which are noted for the thoroughness, artistic value and general breadth of the training, and where pupils begin as early as the thirteenth year. The famous state-supported Swiss technical training institutions at Berne, Geneva and Zurich were also inspected, and the investigators then passed to Germany.

While their general observation is that technical education is much further advanced in Europe, as a whole, than in the United States, it is to Germany that they award the most signal honor for the best of all systems. They found the German industrial schools thorough, systematic and comprehensive. The report says:

> They cover the whole educational period. There are the lower industrial schools, which connect directly with the common schools, and thus become continuation schools and give training to workmen; the higher industrial schools, which correspond to our technical colleges and produce the leading technologists; and the middle industrial schools for pupils who have gone through the lower industrial schools, but who desire to shorten the period of higher education, although they wish to prepare themselves to become upper foremen or assistant superintendents.

Ample provision is made by the State for the support of these schools, which are treated in all respects with the same care and generosity that have marked the conduct of the common schools. It should be noted that attendance at the industrial schools is compulsory for apprentices.

Belgium and Holland, the Commission reports, make an excellent showing in industrial training, the former especially in the machinist's and carpenter's trades, and the latter in wood work, forging and ornamental metal work. Mention is also made of the great technical schools of Glasgow (one of which has 6,000 students), Dublin, Cork, and Belfast, in all of which the youth of those lands are being splendidly trained for useful and practical careers.

There is much in the report that is deserving of consideration by American educators. We are behind the procession in industrial training, and the sooner it is generally adopted as an adjunct of our school system, the better it will be for the future of the rising generation.

A Little Lesson in Thrift

TO the many thousands who are running a neck-and-neck race with ruin, in their efforts to live up to the demands of the world of fashion and foolish extravagance, there is a wholesome lesson in the story of a young wife, whose experiences have been duplicated in many households of the same class. Married to a man of moderate income, she decided to enjoy life as though it were a daily pageant, in which, if possible, they must outshine their neighbors in display. What happened is best related in the young wife's own words:

> An endeavor to live up to our station in society ruined us. We have been driven from our home, our property is gone, and the few things that I loved in the world were sold over my head. It almost breaks my heart to think of it. Society was the cause of it all. I have no money now, and I do not know where I can get any. I have no home, no friends, no resources. I do not know what I shall do. Fortune has been bitterly cruel to us. Our beautiful mansion is a thing of the past. My husband is searching for a betterment of our fortune, but I have no hope. My jewels, gowns, and everything are gone. I paid the awful debt to society, and now I am made to suffer for it. I am very poor—barely able to provide for myself the few necessities of life. I have no friends—nothing. My husband was never possessed of a sufficiency of wealth to maintain our high position in society.

This young wife's experience carries a double lesson to other wives and to husbands as well. The art of "keeping up appearances" and of living beyond one's income, is an old one, and it invariably brings the same result—disaster. We sacrifice to dress, to vain display, to extravagant surroundings, to profuse hospitality, those means which, if wisely used, would assure us comfort and material happiness. There is no slavery so irksome as the slavery of debt. If this young pair had kept their ambitions in check and lived within their means, they would perhaps have excited less of a sensation among their acquaintances; but they would have preserved their independence and retained the respect of all whose good will was worth having.

Again, if instead of "living up to their station in society," as they seem to have misinterpreted it, they had tried to live up to their higher privileges, they might have won the love and admiration of many less fortunate than themselves whom they could have helped. We know of thousands of good men and women who, with very modest incomes, manage to make their influence felt in a very noble way, and throughout a wide circle of acquaintances. These people, however, do not live for pleasure's sake; they are not striving to win the applause or to excite the envy of those whose chief aim in life is to "shine in society." No; they are striving with heart, hand, and means, to live their lives as God intended they should, and to enjoy them to the full in a simple, wholesome way, knowing that the greatest joy one can feel is when he brings joy to some other heart.

Overcome by Temptation

MEN who tell us that crime is a species of insanity may point to a trial in a New York court as a proof of their theory. A young man with an excellent record, happily married, with no bad habits, accustomed to spend his evenings at home, suddenly conceived a desire to speculate in Wall Street. It may have been due to the prevalent epidemic of speculation, or he may have noticed that certain shares were quoted at a low rate and were "sure to rise"—but whatever was the motive, he made the plunge. It was only a small risk, about fifty dollars, but it was soon followed by another of a hundred. Then, the gambling craze getting a firmer grip on him, he risked fifteen hundred. That sum was not his own, but as he occupied a position of trust in a financial company, the getting possession of it was easy. A false entry or two in the books covered the defalcation, or temporary loan, as he regarded it. Unfortunately for him, the shares he bought did not rise and his margin was wiped out. Moral degradation had set in and he began to drink. He made a dissolute acquaintance, who advised him that as he was "in for a lamb, he might as well have a sheep," and he had be take as much more as he could get. He followed advice and, having access to the company's cash, about eighty thousand dollars into a suit case and wal away with it. He went to her home to hide until search slackened, giving her fifteen thousand dollars cover the risk she ran in concealing him. But the man betrayed him to the police and he is now awai trial for his crime and is giving evidence against he the charge of receiving stolen property.

The whole affair is coarse and sordid, but in some its features it is unhappily only too common. All tendencies of our social life tend to foster just such crin Young men in situations of trust, miserably underpa see the financial magnates above them skirting on edge of violations of the law to win millions, and t become inoculated with the lust for wealth and yiel the temptation to steal. It is only a little capital t they need to embark in the race, and it lies wit easy reach through the carelessness of its guardia Can we expect young men without principle to resist temptation? Their ears are too full of the din of struggle to hear the warning voice declaring that the of yielding is disgrace and death. The conflict w temptation is fought in silence and solitude. None besi the victim know how fierce it is. The suggestion that is only borrowing, the hope that even if detected he m escape, the lure of licentious pleasure, all join in be oning him to his destruction. Yet in this recent case in thousands that have gone before, there is a warni which should appeal to him, even if he is oblivious to t sin he is tempted to commit. In yielding he will wro his own soul, his plunder will go into a bag full of hol and in the end he will find he has been a fool.

Among the Workers

—Hon. and Rev. Selah Merrill, U. S. Consul-General at Jeru lem, is now on a visit here with Mrs. Merrill.

—Remarkable success has attended the Bible class at Oce Grove, N. J., conducted by Dr. L. W. Munhall. On some occasio more than four thousand persons were present.

—Rev. William Potts George, D.D., of Poughkeepsie, N. Rev. W. R. Wedderspoon, of Pittsburg; Rev. C. M. Giffen; R J. H. Nicholson, of Baltimore; and Rev. Charles L. Mead, of Ne ark, N. J., were among the leading speakers during the closi days of the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting.

—Mrs. Erwin H. Richards, of the Zambesi Mission, Inhamban writes that the natives give their children queer names at time One bright little native girl has a name which, translated, mea "Guardyard Littlepigs." Mrs. Richards hopes to get her adopt by some Christian patron, and she can then be baptized a receive a better name.

—A correspondent writes us that the late Dr. Sarah J. A. Brow an American woman, and not Lady Somerset, was the pioneer w first proposed the establishment of industrial homes for inebria women. She suggested the idea of the Duxhurst Home, whi was afterward carried out by Lady Somerset. Dr. Brown esta lished (1893-94) Bramble Hall, an Inebriate Women's Home Essex, England, which was the first institution of the kind. S was a most gifted woman, an earnest Christian and an arde temperance advocate.

The Delegates of the International Peace Conference in Session in the Famous "Hall of the Knights" at The Hague

The Parliament of Peace

HOW difficult is the solution of the problem undertaken by the Hague Conference, is obvious to every one who has followed the debates of that international assembly. It has appeared to ny that the regulation of war rather than its preven-n has been the main object sought; but it must be mitted that if the regulation can be of a character to der the practice of war more difficult and more oner-s, in that, too, the Conference may serve the cause of ace. But that is only indirect service which is of no ue if war can be wholly abolished. Much more to the rpose is the attempt to organize an International igh Court of Justice which shall be permanent and al with those minor disputes that irritate the nations d produce a state of feeling out of which war is olved. As a man already smarting under an unre-essed injury will resent a slight that otherwise he uld have passed over quietly, so a nation may become irritated by an unsettled dispute that it will draw the ord on small provocation. It will therefore be a great vantage if a court for the decision of minor disputes always accessible.

It is very gratifying that a practical proposal to estab-h such a court should have come from the American legation, which has held a position of marked promi-nce and influence in the Conference. Mr. Joseph oate, in spite of his seventy-five years, and Gen. Horace rter, the veteran statesman and diplomat, have been spicuous for the valuable services they have rendered. one are more valuable than this of the plan for the per-nent court. Their proposal is that it shall consist of venteen judges, who shall hold office for twelve years d receive a stipulated salary. Nine judges are to be minated by European governments, six by America, d two by Asia. An objection to the project has been sed by Brazil and other American nations, who think at they have been treated as "inferior powers" in the nstitution of the court, but it is hoped that some means ll be found of conciliating them and so avoiding the oposal of Austria to adjourn the question to a future nference. The skill and patience of the American legation will, it is hoped, succeed in this and so a defi-te and concrete result may be achieved, and upon the embers of the Conference may come the benediction:

To the counselors of peace is joy. (Prov. 12 : 20.)

Clergyman on a Steeple

The pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church on Long land has performed a task not generally undertaken y members of his profession. A swarm of bees had set-ed on the spire of his church. They became a nuisance they flew about the neighborhood and through the urch during service. The clergyman tried to hire me one to oust the swarm, but no one would attempt e task. He then decided to do the work. He pro-ded himself with a couple of ladders, a wide-brimmed at, a liberal quantity of mosquito netting, and a pair of loves. After covering himself with the netting, he ade the ascent to the church roof, and hoisted his lad-ers against the tower to a point above the belfry. He as able to reach the place where the bees had taken ossession. With a trowl he cast the comb to the walk elow. The bees swarmed around him, but he escaped without a sting, and descended safely. It may be hoped that the pastor will be similarly successful in removing from his church other causes distracting the attention of his people. There are many such causes, and he will not have to climb the steeple to find them.

Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear. (I. Tim. 5: 20.)

The Board's Dilemma

The immigration authorities in New York have a child on their hands that they do not know what to do with. A woman came from Austria about two months ago, to go to the home her husband had provided in Ohio. She brought three children with her, the youngest of whom became sick on the voyage. It was so ill on Ellis Island that it was removed to the hospital. After waiting a few days the mother and the other children left for their Ohio home. The child recovered and the immigration officers notified the parents to call for it. The father has replied that he has neither the time nor the money to come to New York and the board is puzzled as to what course it shall take. The child is too young to travel alone and the Board has no funds available for the expenses of an escort. One can but hope that some happy solution of the difficulty may be found and that the little one may yet live to acknowledge the divine protection.

When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up. (Ps. 27 : 10.)

Heroic Treatment

A woman whose body is covered with wheals and bruises is under medical treatment at a small village in New Jersey. She entered the house of a neighbor a few days ago in a state of great agitation. She is a young widow and was to be married soon to a man who has been paying her attention for some months. She informed her neighbor that he had gone away after a quarrel with her, declaring he would never return. She wished to leave a letter there disposing of her belongings, as she was determined to kill herself. Her friends expostulated with her, but while they were not looking, she took a bottle of laudanum from her pocket and drank the contents. There is no doctor in the village, but a man was dispatched to get one from the nearest town and in the meantime an emetic was forced down the woman's throat. In spite of it, the fatal somnolence set in, and active measures were taken to keep her awake. Women took hold of her and walked her about, while others beat her with sticks and whips and pinched her arms and body. When the doctor arrived she was in a state of exhaustion from the heroic treatment, but he said the ill usage had probably saved her life. She probably repined under the suffering as the Christian sometimes does under the discipline that purifies and refines him.

Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby. (Heb.12:11.)

The Prospects of Zionism

A London correspondent of the Jewish Press Bureau in New York sends important news relating to the project of restoring the Jews to the Holy Land. He has had an interview with Professor Arminius Vambery, the famous Hungarian scholar, who is a trusted friend and counselor of the Sultan of Turkey. The professor is a Jew, and is proud that, in spite of his struggles and the opportunities of advancement that he might have had by abjuring his religion, he remains a Jew to-day. He has had many conversations with the Sultan on the subject of the Jewish settlement in Palestine, and was the means of securing for the late Dr. Herzl admission to his majesty's presence. The professor said that although the law prohibiting immigration into Palestine still prevails, it is not being enforced, and that under these circumstances many Jews are now entering the country. The Sultan understands the value of immigration of the Jewish masses, and he knows what such immigration can do for the development of the country. He would therefore welcome the immigration of Jews to Asia Minor and Mesopotamia. These places are mostly populated by Armenians, and the Jews would serve the Turkish government as a balancing power. There are large stretches of fruitful land that is the property of the Sultan, and he would be willing to give part of this land to the Jews. The Sultan has also come to the conclusion that in establishing factories and the extension of trade the Jew could do more than any other race to draw money into the country. In spite of Mohammedan prejudice the Jew is becoming recognized as a desirable citizen Professor Vambery thinks that an immediate settlement would be injudicious, owing to the danger of Bedouin depredations, but the chief difficulty of the Sultan's opposition is now practically removed. He knows that wealth will flow in if the Jews come. It will be strange if the Sultan should be the man to invite the Jew to Palestine, yet it would be in accord with the ancient prophecy:

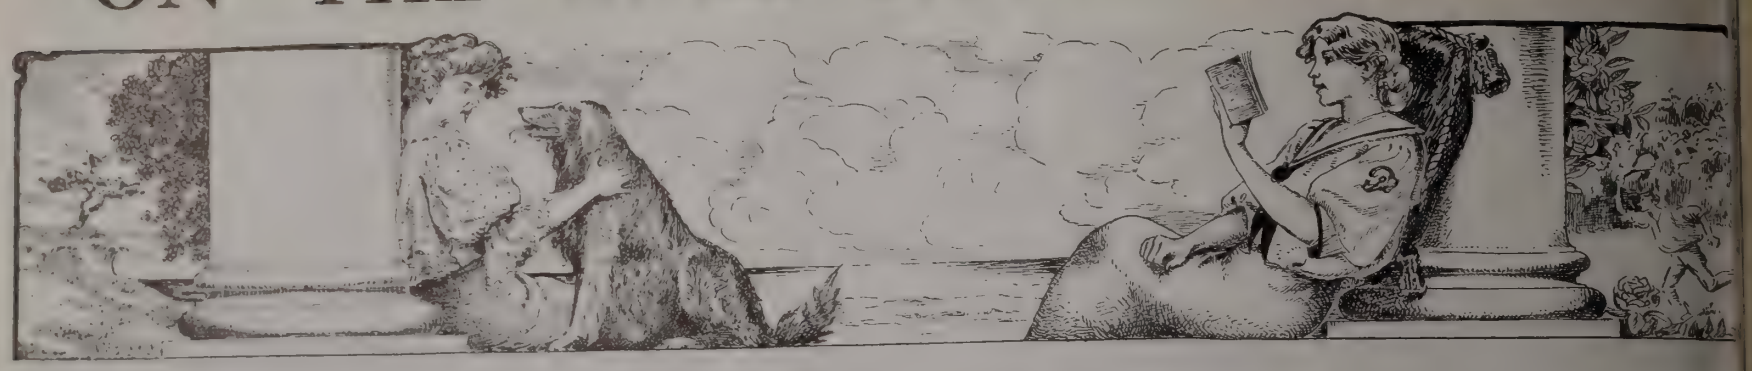
They shall bring thy sons in their arms and thy daughters shall be carried on their shoulders; kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers. (Isa. 49 : 22, 23.)

His Savings Burned

There was a frantic man almost crazy with distress in a small town in New Jersey recently. He is a miller, in the employ of a well-known firm. He went to his work as usual one morning, and when he removed his coat, he took a wallet out of the pocket, and hid it for safe-keeping. It contained his savings for many months, amounting to more than two hundred dollars. He put the wallet in a small furnace which he supposed would not be used on so hot a day. Leaving it there, he went about his work. He did not return until his dinner hour; then, to his horror, he saw a fire crackling merrily in the furnace. One of the men employed in the mill had had occasion to use some solder, and had built the fire to melt it. The miller was almost demented by the sight, and rushed off for a pail of water, with which he extinguished the fire. With trembling hands he raked out the smoking brands, and among them was a wad, which was all that was left of the wallet and its contents. It turned to ashes in his hands as he grasped it, and not a vestige of the bills that could be recognized did he find. It was natural that he should be distressed. The little hoard represented his toil and self-denial for months. We may hope that the loss will not lead him to improvidence, but to that higher investment which is always safe.

Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal. (Matt. 6 : 20.)

ON THE COOL HOME VERANDA



By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Talk About Success

WHAT do we mean by success in life? Can one write out a formula giving component parts, telling how to mix them, and writing directions on the label? Why do some people succeed, why do others fail? How does it happen that some who make a brilliant start tire a little beyond the outset and are seen no more? How can we explain the fact that a few of those who apparently fail according to worldly ideals, are splendidly successful measured by the standards on the book of the Recording Angel? The subject is one of vital importance to everybody, to the young, because life is before them; to the middle-aged, because they have rich stores of experience and should be able to correct their own mistakes; and to the old, because it is never too late to mend, and success occasionally comes in a tidal flood to those who have sought it patiently and waited for it long.

In the minds of a great majority of Americans success means wealth. To begin in poverty and end in millionairedom is the ideal that shines, a radiant vision, before the eyes of thousands. One hears the verification of this in the unconscious envy with which toiling men and women allude to an old neighbor who has made his pile, who has had favoring circumstances and exceptional luck in carving his fortunes.

Success to the scholar means learning more of literature past and present and ascertaining how to apply the knowledge of books to the needs of men. The scientific student peering into the mysteries of nature feels that he has grasped success when he has been able to apply her secrets in discoveries and inventions that aid human progress. A great deal depends on our definition of success. If we have a definite notion of what we want, and a plan and purpose that we may follow in reaching our end, we are more likely to succeed than if we have loosely-compacted ideas and trust to accident.

The first necessity to success is vision. We must see something. The second essential is perseverance. We must not be easily daunted by difficulties. Whoever would succeed, must endure hardship.

An ability to make and keep friends is an appreciable factor in success. "The hermit souls that dwell apart" lose the advantage of friendly counsel and companionship, of a friendly lift on occasion, and of the warm sympathy that is like sunshine on a cloudy day. People who are deficient in initiative, who are always asking what they can do, and making objections to this and the other thing, because it does not quite suit their fancy, will never succeed. They have not the first elements of success. The successful man is able to deny himself many indulgences, is willing to make great sacrifices, and understands the art of eliminating superfluities and sticking to the point.

On the other hand, there are men in every profession who have done faithful work all their days, yet never have attained material advantage either in position or remuneration. In the ministerial profession, in the medical and the legal, there are men of fine parts who never become conspicuous, are never in the eye of the public, who have nothing to leave their families except the remembrance of a good life and the legacy of an honorable name. A few ministers are widely known and a very few command large salaries; but scattered over the country in little hamlets away from the beaten track, in the smaller towns and on the frontier, are many men extremely useful and of more than average ability, who are never heard of outside a small circle. Five or six hundred dollars a year and sometimes less is the amount on which such men do their work and raise their families.

In a mountain land remote from the railway I met, several years ago, a man whose skill as a surgeon and success in healing the sick was extraordinary—a man who spent hour after hour riding over rough roads with medicine and instruments in his saddle bags, carrying help to miners and mountaineers, and receiving in return the smallest possible fees. When asked why he had refused a position open to him in a Northern city this man's reply was, "They need a good doctor here."

This life of ours will soon pass away. It may be very short for any of us, and the longest earthly life compared with eternity is very brief. When we reach the other side the success for which some of us have toiled will appear as the merest rubbish, and the success that has made the world happier, although at the sacrifice of individual comfort and personal ambition, will earn the "well done, good and faithful servant" from the lips of the King. We are going by and by to the place

Where only the Master shall praise us, and only the Master shall blame.
And no one shall work for money, and no one shall work for fame;
But each for the joy of the working, and each in his separate star, Shall draw the thing as he sees it, for the God of things as they are.

A BULGARIAN PEASANT FESTIVAL

THE complaint comes across the sea that the great throng of pilgrims from America has so modified old customs that the pretty peasant costumes are fast disappearing. In Bulgaria, ancient usage still prevails, and girls and men wear the same picturesque dress their fathers and mothers wore.

KNIGHT AND LADY

HE lifted his hand to his plumed chapeau,
He bowed to her beauty and rode away;
He through the glorious world to go,
She in the lone little home to stay.

Swift as a vision he passed the fields
Where the wild rose blushed amid golden grain;
She took up the weapons which woman wields
When fain from herself she would hide her pain.

Out in the thickest of noble strife
He felt the rapture of conflict brave;
And she, shut into her quiet life,
Half deemed its narrowness like the grave.

Yet, strange to say, when the war was past,
And the knight came back wearing valor's stars,
'Twas the lady who, wan and pale, at last
Gave token of wounds which had left their scars.

The Joy of Home-Coming

EVERY home-coming should be a joy. Whetl it be the coming home at night after the da work, or the return of a traveler from a ho day, whether the home-comer be child or pa ent, the words "home again" should be full of inspirati and gladness. When a member of the family has be absent on a visit in which there has been much varie and large provision for entertainment there is often little flatness and loss of savor on settling down into t home routine. This may be prevented if those at hon will make a little preparation against dulness, and sh their satisfaction in having the loved one back, by puttii the house into gala trim and giving the first meal the a of a feast. In theory we exalt duty above pleasur while in practice most of us prefer to have our dai duties alternate with pleasant intervals of diversion. N exception should be taken to this, for there is manife truth in the homely distich, "All work and no pla makes Jack a dull boy. All play and no work mak Jack a mere toy."

Those who attain the highe development of character alwa find pleasure in every duty, ho ever stern its aspect. This scarcely to be expected of t young, and it is their right a privilege to have a margin left their days and weeks for simp enjoyment.

Fathers and mothers who a careful to make each hom coming of the children a festiv will not regret their pains in t end. Children often need reminder that parents have h their share of bearing burden that young shoulders should li them, and that young peop should aid in giving rest and r freshment to those who are olde

The Missionary's Mother

Often as a ship may sail fro port, bearing to her work in th Far East a missionary who ha consecrated her life and talen to the service of Christ, ther stands on the dock watching th out-bound vessel an older woma whose eyes are wet and whos face is pale. Which is makin the greater sacrifice—the mi sionary or her mother—it is har to tell. The one is giving he self, her youth, her enthusiasm her talents that she may toil fo her sisters who have never ha her opportunity. She is goin into active service. She wil enter a new field, find occupatio among new scenes, and be s continually busy that she will have little time for home sickness. The one who remains on shore, sending forth from her daily life the daughter who has been he daily sunshine, feels no reluctance and has not withhel her consent, but she faces a great loneliness and look down a weary vista of years that must elapse before sh can see her child again. If both these women break a alabaster box to anoint the feet of the Master, surely the perfume is as sweet in the home of the missionary' mother, and in her quiet ungrudging life, as in the wide sphere sought by the missionary's self.

Many a time it is really easier to go than to stay. Mothers do not withhold their most precious gifts, th daughters who have been to them the chief delight and constant pride of life's meridian.

nds, not knowing they are rivals. They are ported as slaves to a West Indian island.
Af six months of servitude Girard receives ne of his pardon.

CHAPTER XVI—Continued

THAT accounts for the wording of the pardon, in which His Majesty consents to regard your offense as not so much a crime as an 'indiscretion,'" said General Montaubin, smiling. "But I am not yet done with you, Captain Girard. Here is another paper, signed by the King, restoring you to your rank as an officer of the King's Dragoons. And here," drawing it forth, "is a purse containing one thousand livres, sent by your mother, to pay your expenses back to France. And in my carriage yonder is a trunkful of suitable wearing apparel which your mother has been so thoughtful as to send you."

Francis almost gasped at this accumulation of benefits, and scarcely knew how to make his acknowledgments.

"I shall order one of my servants to bring in the trunk. And if Captain Girard will do me the honor to occupy one of my chambers until he can make the arrangements for leaving the island, I shall be most happy to entertain him," said M. Gromartin, whose respect for his late slave was mightily enhanced by the knowledge that his mother was a Countess (for Americans are not the only ones who worship titles).

The offer was most thankfully accepted.

An hour's assiduous work on the part of a negro lad, improvised as a valet, with the plentiful application of clean water and perfumed soap, and the aftercasement in a suit of immaculate white linen, having restored Captain Girard to the semblance of civilized life, he dismissed the negro and gave vent to his exultant feelings by the performance of sundry acts more or less uncivilized. He danced, he sang, he waved his arms, he jumped high to see if he could hit the low ceiling with his head—and did so, raising a considerable bump on his cranium—when all of a sudden, like a flash from an electric cloud, there rushed into his mind a thought, a name, that effectually put an end to his boyish antics.

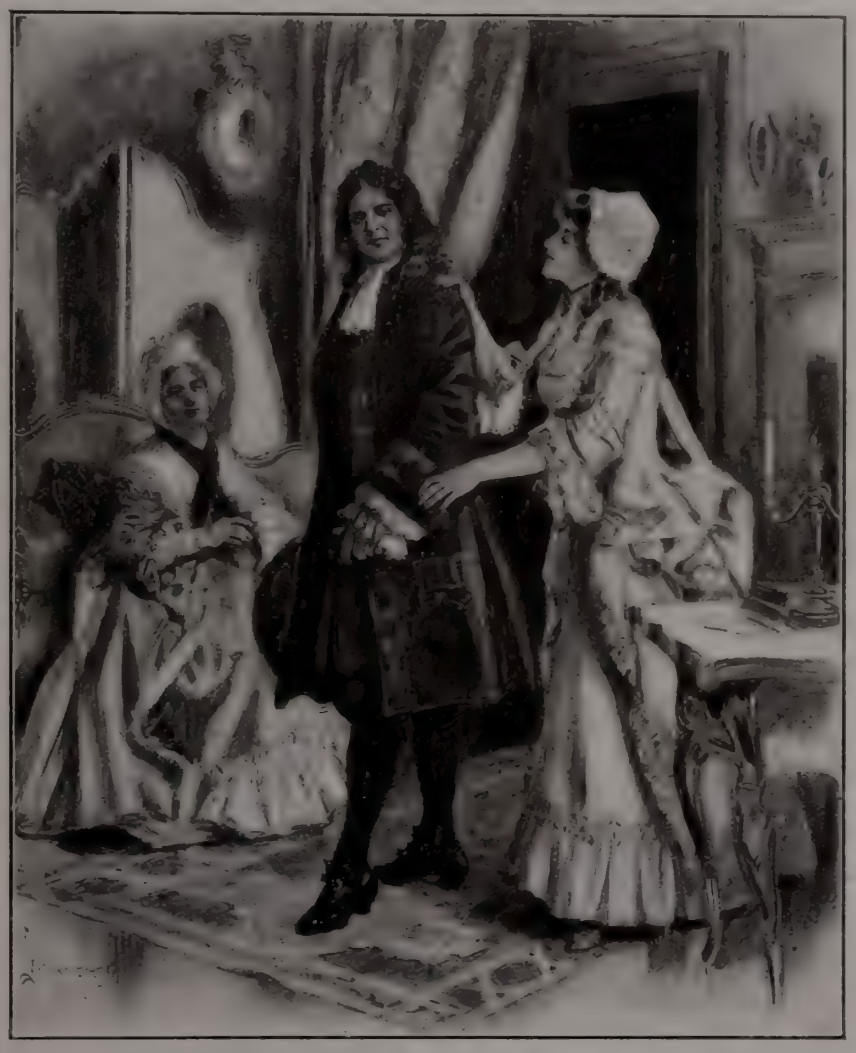
Louis!

In his selfish joy he had quite forgotten him.

He sat down, sobered, to think the matter over.

It was then that there came to Francis Girard the great temptation of his life.

He was free. He had money. There were ships in the harbor of Basse-Terre. What could be easier than for him to take passage to New York or some port whence New York could be reached, seek out Gabrielle, tell her Louis had died on the island, renew his suit, win her for his bride, and bear her with him in triumph when he returned to France? Oh, joy! Oh, rapture!



"'Let me go with you, father,' said Gabrielle, eagerly"

At first he only thought of the rapture and the joy. But soon other thoughts obtruded themselves. Could he go to Gabrielle with a lie on his lips? Could he look in those clear eyes, those wells of truth, those eyes that seemed to gaze into one's very soul, and tell her that her lover was dead, when he knew that he was alive, and might at any time appear? Could he bear her look of scorn when she found out the falsehood, the treachery, the perfidy? Never! never!—True, he might make the lie a truth. He might kill Louis, as he had threatened to do when he first heard of his existence. "But how can I kill a man who has been so kind to me? Did he not bind up my bleeding hands as tenderly as a mother would bind up the cut finger of her whimpering child? And when I was sick, and my soul loathed the coarse food they offered me, did he not stint himself of bread that I might have something to prolong my miserable life? And here—is he not constantly helping me?—And there is another thing. Can I look back on a long line of noble ancestors, men of honor all of them, brave soldiers of France, and can I, perhaps the last of the line, stain their scutcheon by a mean and dastardly act like this?"

Suddenly, in the midst of these harassing and conflicting thoughts, a plan for the escape of Louis suggested itself to him. He drove the suggestion away. No, no. He could not do that. It was beyond the power of human nature. He might succeed in tearing the image of Gabrielle from his bosom; but to free her lover—to throw him into her very arms—that he could not do!

"Help me, spirits of my fathers!" he cried. "Help me, God of the Huguenots!"

It was scarcely a prayer. Yet it was the cry of the heart, and as such was doubtless heard at the throne of grace.

"Prayer is the burden of a sigh,
The falling of a tear;
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near."

He became calmer, and began to reason with himself. Should he do this act of treachery, what would it avail him? Should he, by the compelling power of his passion, win her for his wife, what would it avail him? Had she not said her heart was the other's, for weal or woe, for life or death? What would avail the casket, the jewel gone?

Then there came back to his recollection, as if stamped in letters of fire on the wall before him, the words spoken by Gabrielle in the boat. "Be a man! Conquer this insane passion that is leading you astray!"

And stamping his foot on the floor, he said:

"I will!"

At that moment there was a gentle tap on the door, and a negro girl informed him that supper was ready, and Monsieur and Madame Gromartin desired the pleasure of his company.

Meantime, out among the sugar-canes, Louis plodded on until his task was finished, wondering what had happened to his comrade, and why he did not come back.

But at quitting time, the overseer, being in a communicative mood, told him what had happened.

"That is good for him," said Louis, heartily, "but I shall miss him, and he did not even come back to tell me of his good fortune."

"Not he," said the overseer. "He is being entertained at the great house, and M. Gromartin is treating him like a game bird. Why, they say he is a captain in the army, and his mother is a duchess."

CHAPTER XVII

A Journey

DAVID DE BONNEFOY was a keen, energetic man in commercial affairs. Having established himself in mercantile business in New Rochelle, he had also found it advantageous to engage in trading with the Indians for their peltries—a business in which many fortunes were made long before the days of John Jacob Astor.

The headquarters of the trappers at this time was Albany (then a city of considerable importance), whither the Indians from the northern forests repaired, to exchange their rich furs for a few trumpery articles of little value.

As David, owing to his other avocations, could not attend to this business himself, he employed an agent, named Van Brunt, who resided permanently in Albany.

This man was accustomed to buy up a cargo of furs, and send it down the river in one of the sloops that navigated its waters to New York, where de Bonnefoy had a warehouse, from whence the furs were for the most part shipped to London.

The agent had a son, named Guisebert Van Brunt, whose business it was to see that each cargo of furs reached its destination safely. He was a showy but rather shallow young man, who, having been hospitably entertained a few times at the de Bonnefoy residence, had thought fit to class himself among the admirers of the Flower of New Rochelle.

It happened that in consequence of a misunderstanding between the agent and the Indians, some trouble was likely to ensue; to prevent which it became necessary for David himself to go to Albany.

As it was in the dead of winter, the river was frozen over, and the sailing craft all laid up for the season. It was necessary, therefore, that the journey should be made by team and sleigh.

"I find," said David one morning, "that my agent, Van Brunt, has got into difficulty with the Indians. I suspect he

THE DEATH OF MOSES

International Sunday School Lesson for September 22

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE discourses of Moses to all Israel are ended, and he is summoned by God to meet him in the tabernacle and to bring with him Joshua, who is to receive his divine appointment as Moses' successor (Deut. 31: 14, 15). God tells the old leader and the new how Israel will sin against him in following after strange gods. And God charges Moses to write a song and teach it to the people, that it may be a safeguard to keep them from evil. Moses wrote the song that same day, and taught it to the people (Deut. 32). And when he had blessed the people (Deut. 33), God bade him come up to the top of Mount Nebo, that there he might die.

He was to be alone with God on the mountain, but his going up was watched by thousands of tear-filled eyes till he disappeared from their sight, never to return. Waves of sorrow perhaps swept over their hearts as they remembered how they had murmured against him by the way, and how they had disobeyed him, and how God would have turned his face from them many times but for the pleading of Moses. Did they not that day wish that he might come back to them that they might show him what a loyal people they could be? But all they could do was to mourn and weep for him thirty days. And God met Moses upon the top of the mountain, and showed to him the land which he might not enter. His eye, undimmed by age, took in the promised land in its full extent, from north to south, from east to west, and then those eyes were closed to earthly visions, that they might behold the heavenly land. And for his own good reasons God buried Moses upon the mountain, and no man found his sepulchre.

A Foregleam of Heaven

"This is the land; . . . I have caused thee to see it, . . . but thou shalt not go over." In all ages the view of the land of promise that was given to Moses has been the type of the foregleams of heaven that are sometimes granted to saints in this world. Dr. E. H. Clarke, of Boston, a famous Unitarian physician, put in a book on Visions, published after his death, his conviction, concurred in by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, that in some cases dying Christians behold, as the earth recedes and disappears, sights whose reflection fills their faces with a radiance not explainable by any theory of delusion, and suggesting as its reasonable explanation a real glimpse of friends in heaven and of the glory of the better land. One of the most interesting cases of this kind from another witness, was that of an old general, a veteran both in the service of his Queen and of the King of kings, who was asked in his dying hours by his affectionate son, "Is there anything you wish, father?" He was so languid and exhausted that he could say but feebly, "Only to die." But suddenly this old man, in the last moments of mortal weakness, sprang from his bed to his feet, and clasping his hands, while a transport of joy illumined his face, exclaimed, "I have seen Him." The next moment he passed on to be forever with the Lord. Not to see heaven, but Him, should be our chief anticipation as we think of heaven. Even reunion with human friends that have gone before should be secondary to seeing Him as he is, as Rubens represents Martha, when Lazarus was raised from the dead, looking beyond and above her restored brother to the Saviour who had raised him from the dead. Certainly, anticipation of death should bring no terror to the Christian. It is but migration to a land that is fairer than day.

A Warning Vision

The open secret of Moses' holy living, as of his holy dying, is in that profound verse, "He endured as seeing him who is invisible" (Heb. 11: 27). He "practised the presence of God." God and heaven were real to him, and therefore he could endure the sneers of the Egyptians when he chose, in place of Egypt's crown, affliction with the people of God.

Such a man himself becomes a vision of helpfulness to his children and friends. In an hour of temptation a young man determined to disappear from his home and city, to forswear every duty and to turn his back on honor. In his madness he went to the railway station, for the new career was now to begin. But suddenly, as he stepped from the carriage, he thought he saw his old father, long since dead, standing in the door of the station. The man turned and fled as though an angel with a flaming sword had waved it in his face. An hour later, and once more he had taken up his accustomed task. But from that day he looked back to the event as to a moment when his feet stood on the edge of a precipice. "Forty years have come and gone since that weak hour," says Dr. N. D. Hillis, speaking of the story, "and he still believes that vision was vouchsafed to preserve his soul. Perhaps you and I think it was an illusion; that conscience and memory, in a moment of great excitement, clothed some aged stranger with the likeness of a revered father. But one thing is certain: an angel with a flaming sword really stood in the man's way and barred his feet back from the path of death."

"So Moses, the servant of the Lord, died, . . . and he buried him." The passage, "Died according to the word of the Lord," means literally "by the mouth of the Lord," and the Jews beautifully translate it, "by the kiss of the Lord." As if death had been a bridal, God kissed his soul away. As at creation God breathed the soul into man, so again God's lips drew near to receive the soul back to himself.

Moses in Fault

Moses was not perfect. Usually self-controlled under constant provocation from the Israelites at Meribah, he became angry at their murmuring appeal for water and smote the rock when he should only have spoken to it. The Supreme Court of the universe, unlike the human courts that often spare the great, to show its impartiality to Israel and the world, and the seriousness of the sins of anger and impatience, denied Moses the supreme desire of his life, to lead his people into the Land of Promise. But his sin had been forgiven, even though the sentence could not be recalled; and in death, as so often in life, "Moses talked with God as a man talketh with his friend."

The Kiss of God

Let every Christian count death but the kiss of God—not life's extinction, but life's completion. There is a beautiful legend that at the funeral of Saint Ranieri, at the place in the service when the "Gloria in Excelsis" is passed over as too cheerful for a funeral, a choir of angels appeared and chanted the words to the spontaneous accompaniment of the organ. Paul's swan-song, "I have fought the good fight," was also a note of victory. Such is the triumphant note that Mrs. C. F. Alexander puts into the most popular of the several poems on Moses' death:

By Nebo's lonely mountain,
On this side Jordan's wave,
In a vale in the land of Moab,
There lies a lonely grave.
And no man knows that sepulchre,
And no man saw it e'er;
For the angels of God upturned the sod,
And laid the dead man there.

Perchance the bald old eagle
On gray Beth-Peor's height,
Out of his lonely eyrie
Looked on the wondrous sight;
Perchance the lion, stalking,
Still shuns that hallowed spot;
For beast and bird have seen and heard
That which man knoweth not.

God hid his grave that men might not idolize it, but God did not bury either his influence or his soul. On earth and in heaven, in a double immortality, he goes marching on. His words, given to him by God, reaffirmed by Christ and his apostles, are on church walls in every land, a millions of memories they live as w words of personal character. But the also the basis of civilization in the co Justinian, Charlemagne and Alfred.

As Moses is the greatest of lawyer honesty and honor suggest a consider of opposite qualities in some brilliant yers of to-day, to whom Justice B refers in the following words from a dress in Carnegie Hall, New York, in which was telegraphed around the w

"It is strange that there should much criticism of the bar? We mu member that the wisdom of the lawm can never keep pace with the ingenui trained minds seeking to evade legal tations. The old saying that holes be found in every law means simply an ingenious lawyer can often find e in the statute itself or in the mode o forcement some way of escape fro penalties. It is this which provokes frequent remark that the law so sel reaches the rich, for the rich can pa the brainiest, and the brainiest can certainly and quickly discover the m of evasion. As against this, I appeal a higher standard of ethics. I appe every lawyer to put his heart along his head, to mix his conscience with brains. Let him have the courage to to his client: 'It may be legal, but it is honest; and I will have nothing to do it.' Is this asking too much of the fession?"

Immortality of Influence

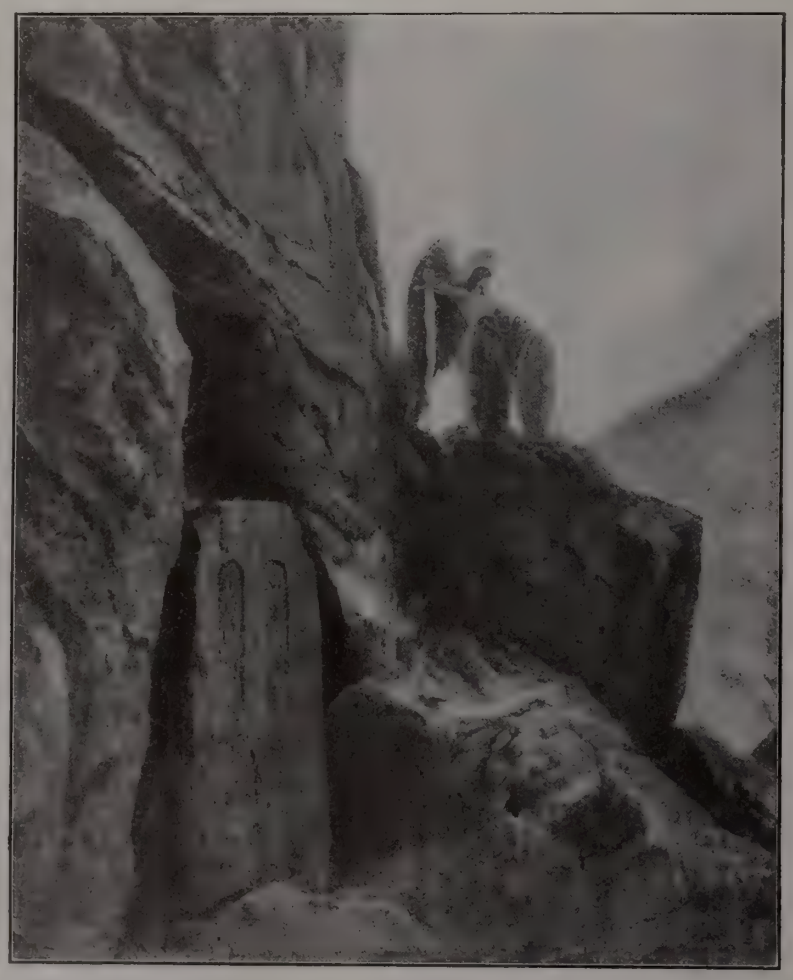
There ought to be an inspiration to ev man to live right in the fact that his in ence, bad or good, though he be not gr will live on forever in this world. words we speak, the deeds we do, are arrows that can not be recalled and never cease their flight. They will friendly warnings or destroyers forever

I might have said a word of cheer
Before I let him go.
His weary vision haunts me yet;
But how could I foreknow
That slighted chance would be the las
To me in mercy given?
My utmost yearnings cannot send
That word from earth to heaven.

O word and look and clasp withheld!
O brother-heart, now stilled!
Dear life, forever out of reach,
I might have warned and filled!
Talents misused and seasons lost,
O'er which I mourn in vain—
A waste as barren to my tears
As desert sands to rain.

But immortality is something more th influence. Moses, who went to God full vigor at 120 years of age, came ba from heaven in more perfect manhood s teen hundred years later, to particip in the earthly coronation of Christ (Ma 17). There is no room for doubt, if believe the New Testament's record, th human personality continues through endless years as in the case of Moses a Elijah. Moses had entered the land promise by way of heaven.

In a stage-coach, one of the passenge a sea captain, told how in a dreadful sto his vessel had been wrecked, and all board except himself and two sailors h been lost. He had saved his life by hol ing on to a plank, and was for a time the mercy of the waves. The compan pitied the unfortunate captain, who w returning home to his family destitut but they wondered that a man telling an escape almost miraculous should en almost every sentence with an oath. "Fo give me," said one of the passengers, "f asking you one question: When on th plank, did you not vow to God that if h would spare you, you would lead a ver different kindof life?" "None of your bus ness!" said the captain angrily. Th journey was continued in silence, but th next morning the passenger who had aske the question was surprised to hear som one rap at his door. He opened it, an beheld the captain standing before him i tears. The captain took his hand, presse it, and said: "Sir, I have not slept a win since I saw you. I was angry with yo yesterday. I am now come to ask you pardon. I did, while on that plank, vow to God that I would live differently fro what I ever had done, and by God's hel from this time forward I am determine to do so."



"Moses went up unto the mountain of Nebo and died there, and the Lord buried him in a valley"

CHAPTER XVIII

The Golden Horse Tavern

IN the days of which our story treats there stood, near the top of that steep but spacious thoroughfare now known as State Street, Albany, a wayside tavern, kept by one Wolfert Van Dusen, called "The Golden Horse."

The street was then a mere country road, quite out of the city, and was denominated Pinkster Hill, from the quantity of rose-colored, spice-scented azaleas (called in the vernacular pinkster-blummies) which in springtime adorned its bare uncultivated sides, intermingled with clumps of huckleberry bushes and here and there a stunted oak or tamarack.

The house was a snug, comfortable dwelling, built, according to the old Dutch fashion, with the gable end to the street. The gable was corbeled, or stepped, and adorned with sundry quaint devices. The door and latticed windows were surmounted by heavy arched mouldings, and the chimneys, according to the style of the period, were elaborately ornamented.

Above the principal chimney was a gilded vane, and on a creaking, swinging sign over the front entrance was displayed a painted and gilded nondescript, intended to represent "The Golden Horse."

Death of the Author of "Gabrielle"

MISS ISABELLA MACFARLANE, the gifted author of the serial story now running in the pages of The Christian Herald, and of a number of poems, stories, sketches and other literary productions, passed away July 31 at her home in Stillwater, N. Y. She was stricken with paralysis in the latter part of June last. Miss Macfarlane was a woman of sterling Christian character, and greatly beloved by a large circle of friends. Her literary work, which extended over many years, won her an enviable fame. Her story of "Gabrielle," now appearing in this journal, is regarded as one of the very best of her productions.

The Bible of the People

IN the last twelve months, the American Standard Bible has come to be everywhere recognized in colleges, theological seminaries, training institutes, and in pulpits throughout the land as the best and most perfect Bible that has yet been produced. Many of our readers who bought the Standard Bible have written to us expressing their great satisfaction with their purchase. It corrects nearly 3,000 mistranslations of the King James and Revised Versions and sheds a flood of light on all the passages hitherto disputed and obscure. The Rev. R. S. MacArthur, of Calvary Baptist Church, New York, writes of it: "I wish it were in use in all our homes and churches." Prof. Ira M. Price, a distinguished authority, considers it "the most perfect Bible in existence," and so with hundreds of others. It is rapidly becoming the Bible of the common people and is finding its way into colleges, churches, Sunday Schools and homes throughout the land. By special request, The Christian Herald has secured a number of copies of the Standard Bible, with Illustrated Bible Dictionary, Concordance and Maps, altogether 1,622 pages, large type, beautiful print, extra thin paper, superbly bound in American Levant, with double book-mark. Sent, all charges prepaid, on receipt of only TWO DOLLARS. Address Christian Herald Book Department, Bible House, New York City.

Questions and Answers

Myrtle B., Denver, Colo. 1. What verse in the Bible contains all the letters in the alphabet except one? 2. Where is the story found about the war in heaven?

1. All the letters of the alphabet are found in Ezra 7: 21, except j. 2. See the Epistle of Jude, also Revelation 12: 7 and Luke 10: 18. Read also the story in Milton's Paradise Lost.

Mrs. M. J. S., Eureka, Calif. 1. How many years elapsed between the creation and the call of Abraham? 2. How long is it since Christ was born? 3. Do bishops hold a seat in the House of Lords?

1. Ussher's chronological tables place the call of Abram in the year 2247 B. C. All attempts to estimate the time between the creation and that event are mere speculation. 2. According to the latest Bible scholars, the present era is five years out of date and the present year would therefore be the year of our Lord 1911. 3. Two half bishops and twenty-four full bishops hold seats in the upper house at the present time.

R. L. M., Petersburg, Va. Is there any Scripture in the Old Testament that teaches missionary work?

The missionary idea runs through the whole Bible. Jonah is a conspicuous example of missionary work. There is no instance on record of such success as his. After one day of his preaching, all the inhabitants of Nineveh, that great city, from the king downward, repented. Amos, too, one of the greatest prophets of the later time, went on missionary service. He belonged to the southern kingdom, but went into Israel at the risk of his life with his message. The Psalmist calls on God's servants to "declare his glory among the heathen" (Psalm 96: 3), and Isaiah delights to picture the success of missionary work.

J. G. B., Lebanon, Pa. Was the command in John 13: 14, 15, to wash one another's feet, incumbent on all Christians, or only on the apostles?

If you know a Christian whose feet need washing, and he is unable to wash them himself; or if he is in need of any other service which he cannot do himself, the command applies to you as a Christian. You may make his bed for him, or go on an errand for him, or serve him in any way, and even if the service is so small as giving him a cup of water, you will obey the Lord's command and win his approval. It is not necessary to take him to church and make a parade of your service. "God who seeth in secret will reward you openly."

W. E., East Norwalk, Conn. Where and for what reason was John Knox sentenced to be a galley slave, as stated in the story of "Gabrielle"?

During the Romish persecution of 1540 and 1548, when many Protestants were burned at the stake, Knox, with other reformers, took refuge in the Castle of St. Andrews. The Scottish Regent, with the aid of a French fleet, forced the castle to surrender, and Knox and many others, instead of being simply exiled, were taken to France and made galley slaves. Knox, after nineteen months of this bondage, was released through the personal interposition of King Edward VI. of England.

G. W. B., Hopewell, O. After Moses married Tharbis, the Ethiopian woman, did he live with her, or leave her with her people? Did Miriam and Aaron become angry against Moses because he married this woman, or because of his subsequent treatment of her?

See Josephus' Antiquities, book 2, chap. 10, for all we know of Tharbis, who was said to be the daughter of the Ethiopian king. This story, however, is regarded by Biblical scholars as an inference from Numbers 12: 1. It may refer to a wife he married after Zipporah's death, or it may even refer to Zipporah herself.

A. S., Garner, Ia. I notice in your Sunday School lesson that you appear to condemn Joseph's dealings in Egypt as to corn. Was he not right?

He certainly did right in storing the corn. The Egyptians would probably not have stored it, even if he had warned them of the coming scarcity. Apparently he purchased the corn in the markets. The "gathering" described was not likely to have been a seizure. Nor does there appear to have been any complaint of his terms when he sold it in the famine. The Egyptians were glad to obtain food on any terms, and when they sold themselves and their land to Pharaoh, the bargain was only nominal. Joseph gave them back their lands, with seed to sow, stipulating only that one-fifth of the produce should be paid. Considering the age and the prevalent customs, the bargain cannot be deemed oppressive.

B. M., Xenia, O. What will be the estimated cost of our battleships' visit to the Pacific?

It is roughly estimated at $1,000,000, but close figures cannot be given, as the cost of transporting such a large force (15,000 officers and men) so far, is uncertain and the duration of the trip is still undetermined. Some estimates put the cost of coal alone at $900,000.

B. P., Limington, Me. What was the cup which Christ prayed (Matt. 26: 42) might pass from him?

It is a subject we shrink from trying to explain. The scene was so sad, so sacred, that it inspires devotion, not analysis. You can, however, easily recognize some of its elements. There was the natural horror of a shameful death from which Christ's young humanity would shrink. There was the horror of the world's sin, which in the aggregate must have been awful. A parent

The Projected New "Pan-American Building," Washington, D. C.

THE new building of the International Bureau of American Republics in Washington will serve as the international headquarters in our national capital of twenty-one different American nations. The cost of this structure, when completed, will be nearly $1,000,000, of which Mr. Andrew Carnegie contributed $750,000. The building will stand on a tract of five acres, facing the Presidential grounds on the east, and Potomac Park on the south. It will be about 160 by 160 feet. The general architecture will suggest Latin-American treatment. It will contain, among other features, a beautiful, dignified assembly chamber, 100 by 70 feet, the "Hall of American Ambassadors," specially designed for international conventions, receptions to distinguished foreigners, and diplomatic and social events. There will also be a handsome room for the governing board; four committee rooms; a library of 250,000 volumes; offices for the director and secretary and a large staff.

PATCHES

Why Brown Ones Come on Faces.

When a woman can get rid of bro patches on her face by changing her diet it worth while for other women who care f their complexions to know something of t method.

A lady in Michigan City says that coff caused the brown patches on her face by fi giving her stomach trouble, then putting h nerves out of order, and the result was sho in her complexion.

She quit coffee and began using Postu Food Coffee and in less than a month t stomach trouble disappeared and within tw months her complexion cleared up and is nc fine and rosy.

She speaks of two men at Westfield, Inc who have both been improved in health b leaving off coffee and taking in its pla Postum Food Coffee, also a husband ar wife of the same place, who were in poo health and suffered from stomach troubl They quit coffee and after using Postum short time the result was natural sleep, retur of appetite, and a gain in strength as fast a nature could rebuild.

She gives the names of a number of othe persons who have been helped by leaving o coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee.

It is a safe proposition that if any coffe user has stomach or nervous trouble, or ba complexion, he or she can get rid of th trouble by discontinuing coffee and takin Postum Food Coffee. It is easy enough t prove the truth of this by making trial. Rea "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There' a Reason."

Co ant Reader. 1. How do the theologians ho deny the doctrine of Atonement satisfy he yearning of the sinner for pardon? 2. How o those who deny the doctrine of original n induce young people to come to Christ?

Both questions are better answered by he organs of the theologians in ques- tio As we understand their theory, ho ever, it is that God did not require an at ement; that he was willing to pardon an sinner that repented, and did not need to e placated by the blood of an innocent pe on. Micah 6: 6-8 is usually quoted in pr f. Persons holding this view regard Ch st as a martyr. 2. They urge young pe le to seek the pardon of their own sin which is generally sufficiently heinous, wi out considering that of Adam.

E. V., Madison, Wis. 1. We are taught that he rejection of Christ involves perdition, yet he Jews, who rejected and murdered him, re God's chosen people, who will inherit the lessing. Is not this inconsistent? 2. Is it ot true that the promise, "Ask and ye shall eceive," is often unfulfilled? 3. Can one who does not believe in the virgin birth be a eal Christian?

Are not you confusing the nation with individual? God deals with his chosen ple in discipline and in judgment. Look at he history of the Jews in every land ie the first century of the Christian era. Was there ever a race so persecuted? Th r own anathema (Matt. 27: 25): "His bl d be on us and on our children," has be n granted. But the time will come wh n they will look on him whom they pierced and mourn. The rejection of Ch ist is suicidal still to the Jew and the Ch istian. 2. Yes, in that broad sense; and it well for us that it is so. Would you gr nt every request your child makes? You kn w that some such requests would be inj rious; yet you encourage the child to ask because you will gladly do what it wants, if you can consistently with your duty. The wiser and the better the child becomes, the more of its requests will be granted. 3. It is not for us to judge. That rests with God. For ourselves, if we found a man sincerely trusting in Christ for salvation; earnestly striving to live as Christ would have him live; kind and helpful to his neighbor, and doing all for Christ's sake—we would greet him as a brother, even if he did not believe in the virgin birth.

O. E. R., Orla, Mo. What is the meaning of the white stone and hidden manna promised to the overcomer in Rev. 2: 17?

The man that overcomes is promised the white stone, the emblem of light and purity as the token of his victory; it is engraved with the name of Christ with special significance relating to the character of the struggle. The hidden manna is the strength for greater achievement, which he has who makes the struggle relying on God's help. Every one who has attempted a task in Christ's cause, knowing that his own power is insufficient, is astonished to find his resources increased by another power, which is here called hidden manna.

Good News for Bible Readers

IT will be welcome news to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to learn that we have secured a number of very handsome copies of the American Standard Bible, which is now rapidly coming into popular favor. We wish to place these beautiful Bibles in the hands of our readers. The American Committee had the use of more available MSS. than any earlier body ever had, and the greatest Bible scholars of all lands pronounce their work the most accurate, reliable, and altogether the best translation of the Book of Books given to the world up to the present time. It corrects several thousand errors that trouble the reader in the other versions, many of them of the highest importance. In the Bible, above all other books, the correct rendering of the originals is vital to the integrity of the sacred message. Dr. Charles Gallaudet Trumbull, editor of the Sunday School Times, writes of the Standard Bible: "It is not a new Bible. It is the same Old Book that our fathers and forefathers read and treasured, but the American Standard Bible brings the Message, and Truth, and the Eternal Promises, closer home to us than ever before." It should be in the hands of every reader. With the Bible are bound up a Bible Dictionary, Concordance and Maps, all in large, clear type, bound in American Levant, with bookmark, sent charges prepaid, for $2.00. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Book Dep't, Bible House, New York City.

WHY NOT GET THE BEST and SAVE FROM $5 to $40?

You know that there must be a big difference between the factory price and the dealer's price on a good stove or range.

Why not save that difference and keep that extra profit in your pocket!

You know that there must be a big difference between a strictly high-grade stove, made of the best materials by expert workmen, and a "cheap" stove made of scrap iron by inferior workmen.

Why not get the best you can find—especially when you can buy it at the actual factory price!

That's exactly what we offer you:

"A Kalamazoo Direct to You"

TRADE-MARK REGISTERED

A Stove or Range of the highest quality at actual Factory Price on 360 Days Approval.

You cannot secure anywhere a better stove or range than the Kalamazoo—no matter how much extra you pay. We guarantee that, under a $20,000 bank bond and give you 360 days in which to prove it yourself.

Our first idea is to make the best stoves and ranges that human skill and experience and honest workmanship can produce from the best procurable materials.

That's why we use only the highest grade pig iron, and a better grade of steel than any other stove manufacturer in the United States.

That's why we employ the most skilled workmen in the business, and maintain one of the best equipped, most modern stove factories in the world.

And that's why the Kalamazoo line has become so famous as fuel-savers, as good bakers and quick heaters; and why they last so long and give such good satisfaction.

At the same time our system of manufacturing and selling direct is such that we save you $5, $10, $20 and in some cases as much as $40 on every purchase.

You cannot get a better at any price. The Kalamazoo is as good a stove or range as man can make—and you save from 20 to 40% in buying it.

And don't forget: you get your money back if it is not in every way exactly as represented.

We pay the freight and ship all Kalamazoos blacked, polished and ready for immediate use. Any man can remove crating and set them up.

A Story of a Lost Conscience*

ONCE upon a time Conscience wandered away, and was lost. This came because no one had paid any attention to her, and she was greatly grieved over the neglect. People had been so cruel to her, that it was useless to live with them any longer and try to do them any good. Things seemed to go on just as before, however, and many people said that they were glad Conscience was lost, as they felt more free and at their ease in her absence. Things that had troubled them once, now were entirely forgotten.

All this while, poor Conscience had a sorry time of it; and once, when crossing a crowded thoroughfare, she was thrown down and stepped upon. While she lay there, no one giving any heed, a wretched drunkard chanced that way, and he stooped and picked her up. But he did not do this from pity. Oh, no. He simply thought that he could sell her for a glass of liquor. But as he went along with Conscience carefully held in his arms, the fumes of wine seemed to clear from his brain, and by degrees there came over him the realization of his exact condition. He felt very much frightened, particularly as his memory began to assert itself, and he now recalled many things he had done of which he was more than ashamed. How treacherous he had been, and how violent, and how unjust! How he had neglected his best interests, and those of his dear ones! Then he began to shed tears, and some of his old friends, who knew him as a miserable drunkard only, gathered around him, and derided him with loud laughter. He protested at this treatment, but they only laughed at him the more. They failed to perceive that he was really in a sober state of mind, and that his words were sincere, and more than all, they failed to see the form of Conscience now clasped to his sorrowing, repentant heart.

The drunkard at last came to understand that it was this poor, neglected Conscience with him that made him feel as he did, and so he said to himself,

"The people do not understand that I am in earnest, and they do not believe in my words. There is really no use to live decently after one has made the first mistake, and gained the awful reputation that I have, and lost his character. So I will not try to keep this Conscience, and come what may of it, I shall get rid of her as quickly as I can."

So saying, he proceeded to the home of his friend Petrovitch, who kept a little wine shop around the corner. As he came up to the window of the little shop, he thought he would look inside first, through the glass. He stole carefully forward, and pressed his face against the window. There was Petrovitch fast asleep behind his counter.

"Ah," said the drunkard to himself, "this is a fine chance to get Conscience off my hands."

So saying, he slipped noiselessly into the wine shop, and placed poor little Conscience in the arms of the unconscious Petrovitch. Then he ran quickly out.

After a little while, Petrovitch awoke, and was terribly startled to find Conscience in his arms, and clinging to him tightly. He shuddered as with the ague. But he sat perfectly still, thinking. There came to him the true state of affairs with him—how he was carrying on his business without a proper license; but upon a second look he observed that he had the papers after all, that the authorities demanded.

But close to his ear, Conscience whispered,

"No, no, it is not right, whether the authorities say so or not, to let the people drink your intoxicating wines."

A few customers came in just then, but Petrovitch sat still and refused to give them any liquor. Instead, he began to tell them that all the list of misfortunes that came to poor people began in drink.

His old customers looked at him in amazement, and one said,

"Why, Petrovitch, you must surely have gone mad."

"Yes," answered Petrovitch, "and the reason is that I have Conscience here. Would not one of you like to have her?"

But they all shrank from him in alarm, and finally, one by one, stole out of the shop and went home, declaring that poor Petrovitch had gone stark mad.

Towards evening, his wife came in to see why the shop was so very quiet.

"Well, my dear wife," said her husband, "we have not sold anything to-day, but what does that matter?"

She looked at him with misgiving.

"I would rather have a clear Conscience than all the money in the world," he replied in answer to her look. Then he went off to bed, and slept soundly.

His wife knew that he could not have a Conscience and continue in his wine business, so she made up her mind that this Conscience must be set adrift. And when her husband was sound asleep, she took Conscience away from him and went out with her into the street, wondering how she would dispose of her in the most effectual way.

Well, it would not be possible to tell all of the people she was put off upon, and the places she was sent to. At last, she became so tired of it all, that she said, "Find me a little baby, and lodge me in his pure little heart. Perhaps I can stay there, and as the little innocent grows up, he will learn to love me, and keep me always."

This was accordingly done, how and by whom the story does not state, but nevertheless it was done, and poor Conscience was at last left in a place of peace. The baby grew up to be a good boy, and then a noble man; and then people said, as they spoke words of praise and affection about him, "He is a great man, with a great conscience."

The lesson of the above little myth, taken from the Russian, carries its own point. Let a little child learn to cherish its conscience, and when it grows up to a noble manhood and womanhood, it will always love it, and not try to get rid of it.

Is Your Bible Message Clear?

WHEN the joy of reading your Bible is marred by obscure passages, with an uncertain meaning, depend upon it, it is not the fault of the Sacred Message, but of those who, in translating it from the original tongue, have failed to apprehend its true meaning and spirit. These difficulties are all overcome in the American Standard Bible, which is universally acknowledged the "most perfect of Bibles," being the product of thirty years of consecrated modern scholarship, with the inestimable advantage of access to many ancient manuscripts unknown to earlier translators. Hundreds of letters from Christian Herald readers attest the great satisfaction and comfort which the Standard Bible gives to its possessors. It is combined with an illustrated Bible Dictionary, Concordance and Maps, altogether 1,622 pages, large type, beautifully printed on extra thin paper, superbly bound in American Levant, with double book-mark. S. ar and diplomatic service. His new intment comes as an evidence of our nment's appreciation of his valuable es and excellent record at the post s long filled with credit to himself onor to his country.

s well understood that there are ems which confront a Jerusalem con- tally different from those to be found here. It is not a bed of roses by any . There are men there of various alities who claim American citizen- for purposes not always laudable or ne. Adventurers, freebooters, ers, fanatics, visionaries and irres- oles from all quarters drift thither— few of them from our own land. To gate and conciliate these incongruous ents is a task that would tax the ce of Job and the wisdom of Solo- and it is inevitable that a consul, is administering his office impartially without fear or favor, cannot escape presentation and even vilification such sources. Dr. Merrill, in these cts, has had to pass through the same ience as his predecessors; but such ks did not influence his conduct as l in the slightest degree. In evi- of this fact and of the high appre- n in which he is held by the best e, not only in Jerusalem but in all time, we have before us a remarkable signed by the Right Rev. G. F. Divine Omnipotence*

KE the other attributes of God, con- sidered already, omnipotence is necessary to our conception of his g. We could not consistently worship od whose power was limited like our To be God at all he must have infi- power over all matter and all mind. e is nothing greater than he in the e universe, no being nor power that successfully resist him, nor put obsta- in his path that he is unable to sur- nt. God is supreme over all the work s own hands, controlling the forces of re and compelling the obedience of reatures.

his does not mean that he may act riciously, doing at one time things that he would not at another, nor treating one man or nation on a different principle from that on which he treats another. He is consistent and is bound by the laws of his own being, laws which he has himself established. For example, it is impossible that he can sin. As the Bible tells us, he cannot deny himself. Like the creatures he has made he is subject to the limitations of his own character. He has almighty power, but it would be contrary to his nature to use that power in a cruel or injurious way. With all reverence we may say, he cannot do that. His own sense of justice, his own tenderness and love set bounds to the exercise of his omnipotence, so that his character forms a perfect balance. Nothing would be more dreadful, more horrible, than the existence of a being endowed with omnipotent power, yet without conscience or without controlling principles. It is not one attribute of his character, but the whole of it, that we adore, when we say, I believe in God, the Father Almighty.

Foolish and unreasonable arguments are based on God's omnipotence through a failure to realize these balances of character. We are often asked why sin is permitted to exist if God is almighty, why there is evil and suffering and misery in the world. These are mysteries that we cannot understand; but we are quite sure that he has reasons for not interfering and that those reasons do not include a lack of power. He has a plan and a purpose in the government of the world that is being carried out, and all that seems to us awry is part of that purpose, which we shall understand when we go into that clearer light in which he lives.

Bible Translators' Errors

WHEN the American Committee who made the new translation for the American Standard Bible began their thirty years' work, they were astonished at the large number of mistranslations they discovered. They had the advantage of access to many MSS. which were unknown to previous translators—the Sinaiticus, the Vatican MS., the Alexandrine, and others among them. From Genesis to Revelation they worked faithfully and long, and the result is a Bible which is more nearly perfect and closer to the original message than any other. The Standard brings to the reader the echo of "the very words spoken by the prophets, the evangelists, the apostles, and even by the great Master himself." It throws a new light upon hundreds of confused and obscure passages. Pastors of all denominations, college teachers and professors are now using it in preference to all others and it is winning its way into American homes everywhere. Its value to lovers of God's Word is inestimable. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will supply a limited number of copies of the Standard Bible, with Bible Dictionary, Concordance, Maps, etc.; 1,622 pages, beautiful clean type, American Levant binding, with book-mark, all charges prepaid, at TWO DOLLARS. Address CHRISTIAN HERALD Book Department, Bible House, New York.

A Little Girl's Composition

A little girl in Holden, Mo., wrote this composition on boys: "Boys are men that have got big as their papas, and girls are women that will be young ladies by and by. Men were made before women. When God looked at Adam, he said: 'Well, I think I can do better if I try again,' and then he made Eve. God liked Eve so much better than Adam that there have been more women than men ever since. Boys are a trouble. They wear out everything but soap. If I had my way, half of the boys in the world would be girls and the rest would be dolls. My papa is so nice that I think he must have been a little girl when he was a little boy."

Fine Complexion is Simply Healthful Skin

The skin is young and fresh as long as the pores are cleansed and nourished—but gets thick and wrinkled when the pores are clogged. The pores contain oil which mixes with foreign matter. Water will not cleanse them. Cosmetics fill them with lime and grease. Face powders fill them with dust.

Pompeian Massage Cream

perfectly cleans out those little skin wells, nourishes their delicate fibres, gives their tiny nerves and blood vessels free action. That is the scientific reason why it keeps the skin in perfect health and the complexion always beautiful.

THE PILGRIM MEMORIAL

At Provincetown, Massachusetts, Where the Pioneers First Set Foot on American Soil

THE laying of the corner-stone of the Pilgrim Monument in Provincetown, Mass., on Tuesday, August 20, was significant in more ways than one. When completed, the monument will mean to Provincetown folk the recognition that it was here, and not on the shores of Plymouth, Mass., that the stout-hearted band of pioneers first set foot on American soil, in that bleak November of 1620.

It was the Mayflower in which the band of God-fearing, God-loving Englishmen crossed the unknown Atlantic in 1620—not in quest of gold, or the mythical Fountain of Life, but in search of a spot where God might be worshiped by each man in his own way, as his own heart-conscience dictated. Singularly enough it was in the Mayflower also that Theodore Roosevelt rounded the end of Cape Cod on the forenoon of August 20 last, and was greeted by a twenty-one-gun salute. The monument itself will be an imposing structure, situated at the top of Town Hill, which rises ninety feet above Provincetown. The shaft, 250 feet in height, will therefore loom 340 feet above sea level, and, in clear weather, will be visible for thirty miles out at sea. It will be twenty-six feet square at the base. It will cost $100,000. It is a copy of the City Hall Tower in Siena, Italy, erected in 1309. The design, by Willard T. Sears of Boston, was selected from among 100 designs submitted by architects all over the country. This shaft of granite and concrete, reinforced by steel, and containing stones presented by 150 Massachusetts towns and cities, and even by ancient churches in England and Holland, will arise as probably the most imposing monument on America's Atlantic seacoast.

TRUTH PERVERTED*

EVERY good word and doctrine may be perverted. A half truth, uttered to people in peculiar circumstances, may be taken up and presented as a whole truth, with disastrous consequences. A youth is inclined to improvidence and is careless with his money, always in difficulty and in debt. You teach him the value of money and impress upon him the duty of economizing. Another youth, who is inclined to avarice, hears your words, and applying them to himself, becomes a miser. The Apostle Paul, in his impetuous way denouncing the errors and faults of the early Christians, was distressed by a similar tendency. He was so thoroughly in earnest in telling the churches that they were under no obligation to obey the Jewish laws, assuring them that Christ had delivered them from "the curse of the law" (Gal. 3 : 13), that the Corinthians and others supposed they might live as they pleased and became lawless, disregarding common morality. It is by such perversity that sects have multiplied in the world. Men have looked so intently on one side of the shield of truth that they have forgotten or ignored the other side, and have ended by denying its existence.

At the present time there is in the current theological discussion a conspicuous illustration of this perversity. Scientific men, drawing theologians with them, dwelt on the rule of natural law and spoke of nature doing this and that, until men came to look on God as dwelling apart from the world and taking no interest in it. They regarded him as an autocratic ruler who had left the world to the dominion of natural laws, and was indifferent to the sorrow and suffering men endured. That was a cruel error and sympathetic men felt it to be so. They felt it so strongly that they began to preach the opposite truth of the divine immanence. Some have gone so far as to declare that the world is the body of God; that God is in every tree and blade of grass and in man himself. So there has arisen an idea that there is no God but what we see in ourselves and around us, and we stand on the verge of pantheism. There is thus danger of forgetting that the God who is in and around us is above us, infinitely greater than we, and is ruling over all. Thus the pendulum, drawn far in one direction, swings to the opposite direction, and in the extremity of truth we fall into error. There is scarcely any false religion in which there are no germs of truth, which, like salt, keep the carcass from rotting; but always in the narrow view or the perverted view error lurks.

A Notable Christian Worker Dead

Mrs. Clara Sprague Whitney, who recently passed away in the Norwalk, Conn., Hospital, after suffering a stroke of apoplexy, may be truthfully said to have died in harness. She was stricken while preaching the glorious Gospel. She had been a reader of this paper for nearly thirty years. She had been a well-known evangelist for some forty years, most of that time in New York and Brooklyn and suburban towns. Mrs. Whitney was an eloquent speaker and a fine Bible scholar and teacher. Hundreds have been brought into the light through her ministrations.

Autumn Days

ONCE more the year puts on her robes of praise,
And chants her fullest Benedicite,
Laying her offering at His throne whose feet
Once made the whole wide earth his holy ground.
Upon her brow she wears the seal of peace,
Like some saint life awaiting its translation;
While strange revealings from the bright beyond
Shine out upon her calm, still countenance.

When the near autumn of my days shall come,
Bringing my soul her latest harvest-home,
O Lord, be thou thyself my rest and crown.

Get What You Ask For

There are many reasons why you ask for advertised articles, but absolutely none why you should let a substituting dealer palm off something which he claims to be "just as good" or "better" or "the same thing" as the article you requested.

The advertised article must of necessity be of the highest quality, otherwise it could not be successfully sold and the advertising continued.

The buying public recognize the superior quality of advertised articles. The substitutor realizes that fact and tries to sell inferior goods on the advertiser's reputation.

FAMILY FOOD

Crisp, Toothsome and Requires No Cooking.

A little boy down in N. C. asked his mother to write an account of how Grape-Nuts food had helped their family.

She says Grape-Nuts was first brought to her attention on a visit to Charlotte, where she visited the Mayor of that city, who was using the food by the advice of his physician. She says:

"They derive so much good from it that they never pass a day without using it. While I was there I used the Food regularly. I gained about 15 pounds and felt so well that when I returned home I began using Grape-Nuts in our family regularly.

"My little 18-months'-old baby shortly after being weaned was very ill with dyspepsia and teething. She was sick nine weeks and we tried everything. She became so emaciated that it was painful to handle her and we thought we were going to lose her. One day a happy thought urged me to try Grape-Nuts soaked in a little warm milk.

"Well, it worked like a charm and she began taking it regularly and improvement set in at once. She is now getting well and round and fat as fast as possible on Grape-Nuts.

"Sometime ago several of the family were stricken with LaGrippe at the same time, and during the worst stages we could not relish anything in the shape of food but Grape-Nuts and oranges; everything else nauseated us.

"We all appreciate what your famous food has done for our family." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

A UNIQUE DEATH

By Mrs. M. Baxter

NO eye but God's saw the last moments of Moses, no hand but God's might bury him. No weeping eyes, no farewell, no last words, no signs of dissolution were upon him: "His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated (Deut. 34: 7), when at the word of the Lord, and alone with God, he died. After a day of almost unparalleled exertion, Moses "went up from the plains of Moab unto Mount Nebo, to the top of Pisgah, that is over against Jericho." He went up to meet the Lord before he met with death, "and the Lord showed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan, and all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim, and Manasseh, and all the land of Judah unto the hinder sea, and the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm trees, unto Zoar."

The last day of Moses' life was wonderful. We have seen how he had written "this law," referring to Deut. 29 and 30, which seems to be an appendix to the previous chapters of this book of Deuteronomy, and that, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book till they were finished, he commanded the Levites: "Take this book of the law, and put it by the side of the Ark of the Covenant, . . . that it may be there for a witness against thee" (Deut. 31: 24-26).

But God would give them another witness. He said to Moses, "Write ye this song for you, and teach it to the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel. . . . And it shall come to pass, when evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed. . . ."

So Moses "wrote this song the same day, and taught it to the children of Israel" (Deut. 31:19-22). And after writing it, Moses "spake in the ears of the assembly of Israel the words of this song, until they were finished" (32:1-44). Then he exhorted them: "Set your heart unto all the words which I testify unto you this day; . . . for it is no vain thing unto you; because it is your life, and through this thing ye shall prolong your days upon the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it." And the Lord spake unto Moses that self-same day: "Get thee up into this mountain . . . and behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession; and die in the mount whither thou goest up, and be gathered unto thy people." And he went up. What a day of labor for a man who knew that he had to give up his life before the day was over!

This man was neither occupied with the manner of his death nor of his burial. Such a man could leave these things to the God he served. His last will and testament was the law and also the special blessing with which he blessed the children of Israel before his death. It is very touching, and it manifests the heart of our God, that, after speaking in the Song of Moses, and in his own words to Moses, of the sin into which his people should fall, and his anger which would be kindled against them, that his message of blessing to the tribes should be of his faithfulness as the God of Israel. What a word for those who in all generations should stand true to God in the midst of the almost universal departure from him! What a word for the prophets whom the fathers persecuted! In the special words to each tribe it is noteworthy that the chief blessing comes upon those who were especially separated unto God: Levi, "who said of his father and of his mother, I have not seen him; neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor knew he his own children" (verse 9); and Joseph, who was "separated from his brethren" (verse 16).

Does your food cost too much?

NO matter how much food you can buy for a dollar, it costs too much if it doesn't contain a hundred cents' worth of food value. Quaker Oats is greater in food value and costs less money than any food you can buy.

Read this Testimony from London.

London, England, June 26, 1907. — At a gathering of great doctors under the presidency of the Lord Mayor of London, Sir James Crichton Browne, one of the greatest authorities on foods and health, said that right feeding is better than education and he insisted that "wage earners spend too much for food." He deplored the fact that there is not more oatmeal eaten, and asserted that "a small plate of oatmeal porridge is equal to two thick slices from a four pound loaf."

A package of Quaker Oats costs ten cents and will make thirty plates of porridge, or the equivalent in food value of sixty slices of bread. The best and cheapest food you can eat.

Quaker Wheat Berries

The most attractive form of whole wheat. Entire grains — puffed and baked—brown and delicious.

Shall We Know our Friends in Heaven?

No question has more frequently been on the Lips of the Children of Men, especially those who have laid away the Dearest Treasures of their Hearts, than the one which heads this page. Dr. Madison C. Peters, the Eminent New York Divine, whose Writings and Utterances have made him Internationally Famous, undertakes to Answer this Query in his Magnificent Work, entitled

The Great Hereafter

OR GLIMPSES OF THE COMING WORLD

I believe the saints will differ in Heaven in the glorified bodies which their souls will wear, and that the characters which they make on earth will determine their eternal bodies.

From the CITIZEN, Boston, Mass.:

"The Great Hereafter will be an ideal holiday or birthday book for everyone who has lost a friend or who is interested in the world to come. There is no book now in existence so admirably adapted to the purpose for which this was prepared."

★ ★ ★

From Recorder JOHN W. GOFF:

"A casket of beautiful gems is The Great Hereafter. Dr. Peters must have devoted an enormous amount of work upon it. Mrs. Goff has gone over it from cover to cover, and she is delighted with it."

★ ★ ★

From JAS. R. DAY, D.D., Chancellor of Syracuse University:

"The Great Hereafter is a combination of profoundly valuable things upon a subject of the deepest possible interest to men. It will be helpful to thousands of hearts that are deeply anxious about these great matters of another life."

From Ex-President GROVER CLEVELAND:

"THE GREAT HEREAFTER will not only have a place in my library, but will often be found in my hands, as a source of reinforcement of faith, exceedingly opportune in these days of loose thinking and careless teaching."

From the N. Y. OBSERVER:

"Individuals who have lost friends can never be satisfied with commonplace answers to their inquiries concerning their state and employments, and all men, knowing their immortality, would fain penetrate into the future. This book sets forth the world-wide belief in the immortality of the soul, the proofs of it derived from all sources, and all that can be gathered respecting the state of the dead, and the world beyond the tomb."

Getting Ready to Build a House of Red Clay

Where the Poor of Damascus Live

Preparing a Meal in a Damascus Kitchen

A RIDE AROUND OLD DAMASCUS

By O. E. MOFFET,

Pastor, First Baptist Church, Streator, Ill.

I TOOK a ride over the country through which Abraham's army passed. Centuries of poor cultivation have caused much of the soil to wash away. Here and there are seen wheat and lentils growing, but most of it is grazing land, with many loose stones on the surface. It is now a poor country, but in Abraham's day it was probably fertile.

It was to Damascus, newly built by the Romans, that Paul came, blind and humbled by his conversion on the way. I followed the old road over which he probably came to the city. A high place, a few miles out, is said to be the spot where Paul was stricken with blindness.

When we think of the glorious history connected with this place, our expectations are wrought up, and we are liable to forget that its former greatness has departed. So nearly all the travelers I talked with were disappointed in Damascus. Some of them have in mind the ancient city and not the modern one. Most of the ruins of that city are buried many feet under the debris of two thousand years.

I approached the city from a neighboring ridge, in a carriage, and got my first view just as directed. I saw the white buildings shine with ivory whiteness. As for the dark clumps of verdure, the pitiful little gardens seemed poorly kept and looked decidedly sickly. The gardens of Jaffa, Acre and Beyrout are larger and more beautiful. I have seen one plantation in our own Southern States more extensive and grand in appearance than the gardens of Damascus. The roofs of terraces were just dirt of a dark mud color, and the domes, minarets, and towers are not as impressive or as clean as the factory chimneys and church spires of a Western city.

One of the chief citizens of the place explained to me that the scavenger arrangements of the city had been somewhat deranged the day before. This work is done by a pack of mangy dogs. They look hungry enough to eat anything, but evidently they were not attending to business that morning, and I know the reason why. The evening before a lady at the hotel said she was going to feed the beggars. I suggested that she feed the dogs instead, and she did. When she sent in for a second basket of bread, I went out to see how she was getting along. There were fifty-eight dogs around her and more were coming. On returning from my morning walk a police officer was at the hotel, and complained that the lady had fed the dogs so well that they would not take the offal from the streets. It was a serious matter for Damascus. The street-cleaners had gone on a strike.

Women of Damascus on the Banks of the River Pharpar

I walked through the "street called Straight," and thought of the time when the great apostle Paul came there. This street is now only about twenty-five feet wide, but still one of the widest in the city. Going out at the east end of this street I passed through an ancient gateway in the city wall, the sides and arch of which were fine specimens of ancient Roman work. Just south of this is one side and half the arch of what was once a much larger gateway. Still south of this fragment is a shed built against the ancient wall, where a merchant sells curios to travelers. Going into this place I saw in the city wall another gateway like the exit of the street. This will give you a conception of what the street was in the time of Paul.

These ruins were once the street entrance, and formed the usual ancient triple gateway. The great gate was for the caravans, and the two smaller ones on either side for foot passengers. This would make the ancient street about four times the width of the present one.

From this gateway two rows of great stone columns ran right across the city. A part of this colonnade can still be found built into houses where the streets once stood. I was told that down under the present street parts of a pavement of great hewn stones can be found. Now, with these fragments before us, we can construct in our minds the ancient street. A broad, straight thoroughfare, about a hundred feet wide and a mile in length; on either side, the two rows of massive columns, and back of these the buildings of great hewn stone. The tendency of the Oriental to take a little more than belongs to him caused him to encroach a few inches on the street whenever a new building was erected, and in centuries this reduced the street to its present width. Probably all the other streets have suffered in the same way.

The modern city is not nice. I met an American in one of the narrow streets who greeted me with the remark: "Well, they say Damascus is the oldest city in the world, and it looks like it and smells like it." It is made of mud. The high walls about the gardens are red earth, so are the walls of the houses, and the roofs, and most of the floors; though the more pretentious dwellings have tile or stone floors. It seems an inconsistent combination; but I saw houses whose outer walls were built of red mud mingled with straw, and whose roofs were dirt and grown up with weeds, have nice, polished marble floors.

A little girl of Beyrout told me that in Damascus "the door-yards were in the middle of the houses."

THE Rhythmic Song

TEXT—Psalm 119:54:

"Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage"

NEVER did sculptor's chisel create two statues of more opposite character than are Michael Angelo's "Moses" and "David." When you study these two wonderful figures it does not seem possible that the same human brain could conceive both. They are different as the storm-cloud and the sunshine, as the rumbling onrushing avalanche breaking loose from its anchorage, and the bubbling, laughing, leaping, happy brook gurgling down the mountainside. They are different, as the shrieks and the groans of the carnage of battle and the soft cooing lullabies of a mother rocking her baby to sleep. In other words, the one statue represents power, and the other love. The one represents the crags and the cliffs and inaccessible heights of old Sinai, with its bare rocks indented by the-sword cuts of the lightning; the other represents the melodious harp of the young shepherd boy singing to his sheep among the wild flowers of the valley, and the dreamy relaxation of the poet while, lying upon a couch of softest leaves, he watches the parent birds feed their young among the swaying branches overarching his noontide resting place. Never did Phidias' colossal statue of Zeus at Elis, or Canova's Theseus at Vienna, represent greater strength than does Angelo's Moses at Rome. Never did Praxiteles' Aphrodite at Cnidus, or the Sleeping Ariadne at Rome, reveal more love or poetic symmetry than does Angelo's marvelous statue of David at Florence.

The Skeleton of the Statue

But though we have a perfect right to think of David the musician, David the poet, David the imaginative youth who is always singing the praises of God, I wonder if we have not sometimes overlooked the fact that David sang his songs of triumph under the shadow of Mount Sinai, and that he had but a vague and shadowy idea of the tenderness of the cross of Jesus Christ? The poetic eyes of David in the statue may not search us from out of deep sockets or from under overarching forehead as do the penetrating eyes of Moses the lawgiver, but the same thought that teemed in the brain of Moses lived and throbbed in the brain of David. All through the Psalms I find that the Ten Commandments of Mount Sinai are the skeletons upon which David the Psalmist based his praises. When David writes his most beautiful songs he seems to be echoing in rhyme what Moses the great lawgiver had written five hundred years before in the books of the Pentateuch. David's poetry is only Moses' laws and commandments set to music.

It was so with the other poets whose compositions are in that great hymnal. Turn almost anywhere in the Psalms and you can find this fact illustrated. What is the burden of the 119th Psalm? It is the law, the rock-ribbed law of God. "O how I love thy law! It is my meditation day and night," is the song. What is the burden of the first Psalm? It is the law of God. What is the burden of the thirty-seventh Psalm and the fortieth Psalm and the seventy-eighth Psalm? It is the law of God. And to-day in the words of my text the shepherd poet tells us that the statutes of God have been his songs in the house of his pilgrimage all through his life. The law of Moses is here found to be the theme of the sweetest singer Israel ever produced.

The Law Set to Music

Did you ever stop to think that the laws of God could be set to music? Oh, how prosaic a book of common law is to the average man! When my brother was a young student in the law college, he one day came to my father and placed before him a law book and said, "Father, read that! Did you ever read any set of rules so dry or so uninteresting?" Truly, for a young man a law book is a dry and uninteresting book. But when the young man has mastered those dull codes and uses them in his practice, they are changed from dry skeletons into living forces. Then he sees how those legal enactments are the great barriers by which the rights of men are protected against the assaults of evildoers. So with David. When he mastered the principles of God's laws, he was able to clothe them with poetic imagery. He saw the far-reaching effect of those laws. Instead of being a collection of skeletons bleaching in a cemetery, they became to him a living power. As living principles they welcomed him at the cradle. They guided him through childhood's hours. They led him forth into the struggle of young manhood. They were the crown of glory of his old age. Thus as an aged servant of God he celebrates the glory of old Mount Sinai as he sings, "Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." Now let us try to understand how God's laws have become the keynotes of David's songs.

In the first place, the statutes of the Lord were the Psalmist's cradle songs. They were the lullabies with which his mother used to sing him to sleep. They were the divine promises with which God adopted him as his child. The covenant with which Abraham's children and children's children became part of God's great redemption plan, was the same covenant with which Christians enter into adoption as God's children. And they are the same divine promises with which our children enter into covenant relations with God.

Conditions of Inheritance

Now, the great practical question which comes before us to-day is: How can a child of Christian parents become a child of the covenant? In the old dispensation the rite of circumcision made a child a partaker in the covenant. Abraham was a child of God. He was to inherit Palestine, and besides this he was to have the divine protection. His descendants were to enjoy the same privilege so long as they obeyed God's law. The promises of God were to be continued from one generation to another to all of Abraham's descendants who fulfilled the obligations of the covenant. It was a bargain, and the seal of it was the outward rite which marked the child as an heir of the covenant. In other words, circumcision in the old dispensation was the sealing of a parental compact with God. Let me illustrate: You come to me and want to buy a tract of land for $10,000. I say, "Mr. Jones, why are you buying this land?" "Oh," you answer, "I am buying this land for a homestead where I can live, and my children can live after me generation after generation." "All right," I say, "I can sell you the land, but you will have to pay the taxes and fulfil your obligations to the county, and your children will have to do the same when they inherit." You understand that and I say: "Then in consideration of $10,000 I will give you a deed of that land for yourself and your heirs forever. That deed will seal the bargain." Just so the descendants of Abraham entered into covenant with God. They were under obligations of which the rite was the visible sign. But the rite counted for nothing if the obligations were not fulfilled. The later history of Abraham's descendants proved that the real condition was obedience, and that when this was not rendered the outward sign was not accepted. It became a mockery when it no longer represented a change of heart.

The Cradle Song

My brother, do you wonder that David said: "Thy statutes have been my songs when I was a baby in the cradle." Was not David consecrated to God when he was a child by a godly father and mother? Will you not allow Christ to take you and hold you close to his loving heart, because your Christian mother gave you to him by prayer and pledge when you were a little innocent child? Thou divine Father, by the sacred mounds of my father's and mother's graves, I thank thee that thou art and always wilt be a covenant-making Christ, and wilt save me in answer to the prayers of my loving parents for Christ's sake.

But the statutes were more than the guardian angels which sang the songs of the nativity over the manger of Bethlehem of Judea. They sang for David the happy songs of childhood. The statutes became songs of rejoicing. They were the conditions of sonship and inheritance which it was a joy to fulfil. They were the sweetest recollections of the old homestead when he was a growing boy. They were the songs which made his father and mother and brothers one at the family altar. They were the songs which taught him how to say his evening prayers at his mother's knee. They were the songs which made him as a child study the old Mosaic laws. They were the songs by which he was corrected when he did wrong. They the songs which taught him faith in God as we faith in his fellow men. In other words, they were same laws by which you and I as boys and girls developed in a Christian home for our life's stru If you did not learn these statutes of God when were young, then you are poor indeed. If you learn the laws of God when you were young, then memory of them makes you rich indeed.

The Wealth of the Poor

The happiness of our childhood days was not pendent upon the size of our father's pocketbook. to a great extent it was dependent upon whether parents obeyed and made us obey the statutes of Lord in the house of our pilgrimage. Some time a sorrowing son was on the way back to the villag his boyhood to bury an aged parent. "How m was your father worth when he died?" asked on his friends. "Nothing; I think he was worth less t nothing. I suppose I shall have to bury him." the day after the funeral the young man was g down the village street. As he walked along he an old man, who held out his hand and said, "G bless you, my boy. Jim, you had a good father. knew him for forty years." A little further on a yo girl stopped him and said, "Jim, your father was best friend my mother ever had. When papa die gathered in all our harvests and has made it poss for us to live." A little further on he met ano man, who said, "Jim, there is not a man, woman child in this whole region who has not been brou nearer to God on account of the noble life of y father." When the young man turned his steps tow the old home, he said to himself, "Well, my fa did not have much money, but he was rich. lived rich in God's grace and he died triumphant God's love, and I guess I have inherited someth better than money."

Home Discipline

Tell me, friend, was not the religious training your boyhood the sweetest memory you have of old homestead? When your parents were bringing up you thought those statutes of God were awf strict. It did seem at times as though Sunday wo never get through. When you got up early in morning there was the new baseball and the fine b "No, no," said mother; "you cannot use it to-d Better put it away in the closet and then you will out of temptation." And then when the other b were ready to go off fishing you had to come back family prayers. Then those long tramps with the d cate food for the sick neighbors. It did seem t mother was always sending food to some one. A then those Bible stories you had to learn, when Rob son Crusoe and that new book of Jules Verne were lyi so near. But tell me, do you not to-day glory in th strict ways of your old home? Those old folks were strict that they would never do anything they thoug the statutes of the Lord forbade them to do. But not those strict laws of God bring a peace to your homestead which not any of the so-called liberal ideas the present time have ever produced? Yes, I think have a right, like David, to sing, "Thy statutes ha been my songs in the happy days of my childhood."

Marching Songs

But the statutes of the Lord were more than a sacr memory of the scenes of David's boyhood. They w the songs by which the young man and the midd aged man kept step in the journey of life. Just t same as the German soldiers, when on a line of marc invariably start up one of their national airs and si as they tramp along, and all in unison keep step to t music, so this marvelous man of my text kept step the laws of God during his journey of life, and sang he walked along.

In the first place, there was that overwhelming bug call by which David was set aside, when yet a mere la as the future king of Israel. Oh, could David ev cease to praise the law of God for that tremendous da

THE JEWISH DAY OF ATONEMENT

ACRED beyond other days in the Jewish calendar is Yom Kippur, or the Day of Atonement, which this year is observed on September 18. It is very significant he Jew, in whatever land he may be living, ay aside his business at sunset on Tuesday, ill, for the next twenty-four hours, give lf to the observances of his faith. His on the stock exchange, in the bank and in ourts will be vacant, and his store will be ll, whether it is stocked with watches and nds on Broadway, or has but a few shoe and suspenders on the shelves of a base- Eager as he is for business, he leaves it Gentile rivals on that day. More impor- o him than any worldly transactions is the r on his mind during its hours; for then emory recalls the sins of omission and com- on which have marked the past year, and umiliates himself before God and seeks e forgiveness. In the Jewish as in the Gen- ommunity there are some members to whom egious observance is merely a day of absten- from labor, void of solemn purport; but g the Jews, thanks to parental teaching, e are few who fail to realize the meaning of acred day.

is a miserably impoverished ceremony that nessed in these times among Jewish com- nities in every land. Least of all in their own land is any adequate observance. The day is bereft of its ent glory, and even that fact may form some part e humiliation which the devout exile feels, as he mbers the national sins, which have brought down divine wrath upon his people, rendering them less on the face of the earth. Individually, he seek atonement for his own sins; but where is the nal ceremony wherewith in former days the whole came near to their God?

ow on such an occasion the thoughts of the devout must go back to that golden time when, at the st of Solomon, the whole nation assembled to keep fast around that magnificent edifice which was ll with the visible glory of Jehovah; or still er back, to a time antedating the origin of all the erful nations of our era, when that horde of newly ncipated captives, encamped in the desert, saw on in his white robes at the entrance to the Taber- e, sending away the goat to Azazel! What a day that in the national calendar!

he ancient ceremony is described in Lev. 16. After usual morning burnt offering, the high priest ped himself of his official garments, which consisted blue robe, an embroidered coat, a breastplate, an d, a mitre and a girdle, and arrayed himself in "holy garments," which were pure white, prepara- to entering upon the special services of the day. hen took a ram for a burnt offering and a bullock sin offering for himself and his house. The bul- was examined to see that he was clear of all de- , and when found perfect he was killed, and some of blood taken by the high priest with a censer full of ing coals from off the altar of burnt offering, with ndful of sweet incense, and brought within the veil. high priest then put the incense upon the fire re the Lord and sprinkled the blood of the bullock upon the mercy seat and before the mercy seat seven times, to make an atonement for himself and his house.

The high priest then returned to the court and took two kids of the goats for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, which were paid for out of the public treasury. The two goats were brought before the Lord at the door of the Tabernacle, and Aaron cast lots upon them; one lot for the Lord and the other for Azazel, the spirit of evil supposed to live in the wilderness. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell was killed and offered for a sin offering for the whole congregation. The high priest then caught some of the blood in a plate and passed again into the Tabernacle beyond the veil. There he put the incense on the live coals which caused the sweet perfume to rise in a cloud. He then sprinkled the blood on the mercy seat and before the mercy seat seven times, to make an atonement for the children of Israel.

He then came out to the altar of burnt offering and with the blood of the bullock and the blood of the goat sprinkled the altar of burnt offering. "He likewise sprinkled with blood both the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry." The live goat was then brought and Aaron laid both his hands upon its head and confessed all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and the goat was sent away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. And the goat was supposed to bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land of separation; and he let go the goat in the wilderness. Then the body of the bullock and the body of the goat for the sin offering were burned without the camp.

The tabernacle had three apartments, each increasing in degrees of sanctity. The first was the court, which contained the altar and the laver; then the tabernacle proper in the far end of the court, which consisted of two rooms: the first, called the sanctuary or holy place, wherein was the candlestick, the shew bread table and the golden altar. Then a veil intervened, which secluded the holiest of holies beyond, in which was the ark of the covenant. This was a box or chest, made of the acacia wood and overlaid with plates of gold. Within the ark was God's holy law, the Ten Commandments, engraved on stone, the first word of which was the ineffable name, Jehovah. "I am Jehovah." On the top of the ark was a lid or mercy seat, made of pure gold, with cherubim beaten out on either end. Between these two cherubim shone forth that supernatural light from off the mercy seat, which was called the Shechinah, a name which, although it does not occur in our Bible, was used in subsequent years by the Hebrew commentators.

Any Israelite might come into the court of the tabernacle; none but the priests could enter the sanctuary; the high priest alone could pass beyond the veil, and he only with the blood of the sin offering on the Day of Atonement. In this special service, when the high priest sprinkled the blood on the mercy seat, tradition says he was required to count aloud, lest he should make a mistake; thus: once, twice, thrice, and so on unto the seventh time; and then he pronounced the incommunicable name, Jehovah—the name by which God is known to his people in connection with the Messiah, the Coming One.

All this belongs to the ancient time, which has long passed away. Not even the Jew, in spite of his veneration for the ordinances, would dream of renewing them. He knows that the goat did not bear the sins of the people to Azazel, and that the ceremony was but a type. Would that he could advance still further and see that "Christ being come a high priest of a more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, has entered once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us, putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself."

The Tables of the Law

is history, when Samuel came into the home of his her Jesse and poured the anointing oil upon his head? days and weeks and months, do you not believe he dered over his coming glory? When he was an aged g, with his hair white as the almond tree in blossom, you not believe he still gloried in the fact that God set him aside as one to fill a throne? And yet, has re no anointing come to us? Has not each one of been set apart to do some special work which cannot done by any one else? We have not been called to a throne, but we have been called, as David was, to ve our generation and to testify to others that it is od to obey the statutes of God.

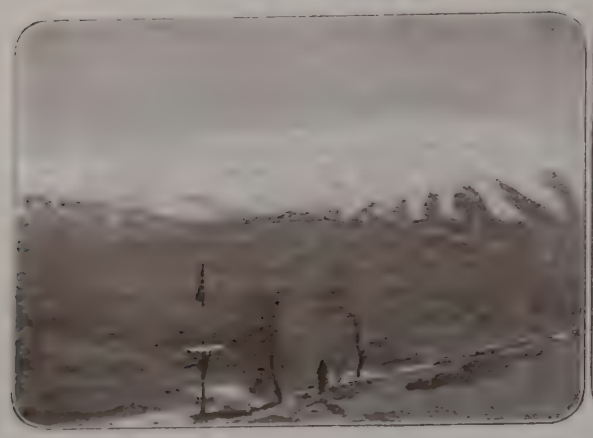
Then, like David, we should glory in the fact that d has not only detailed us for an especial work of , but also because God has cared for us and guided and protected us while we are doing that work. That uld be a careless father who would tell a son to go d do something, and then not care for the welfare of child while he was carrying out the parental orders. God's divine protection during all of David's life d during all of our lives has been hovering over us d helping us upon our feet when we have fallen, and bringing us back to the straight path of virtue when we have wandered away and been caught in the entangled thickets of sin.

And to-day I would especially impress upon the young the fact that God still protects and cares for those who obey his laws. Sometimes the young are so near-sighted that they cannot understand this. Life in its earlier days seems to be such a struggle for most young people that at times they do not think it pays to be good. Thus, some of them play the fool, as did David down in King Achish's court. But, my young friend, I have a wide and varied experience, and I want to tell you that it never pays to break one of God's laws. And I also want you to know that some of the trials and troubles of life of which you are now complaining, are yet to be your most happy songs of praise.

But there is one word in reference to my text to which I want to draw your attention. It is the last word: "Thy statutes have been my song in the house of my pilgrimage." Now, what is the pilgrimage? "Oh," you answer, "a pilgrimage is a journey; it is a long tramp; it is a long, wearisome, tiresome trip." Is that your definition of a pilgrimage? Then, my friend, it is a wrong definition, for you have only told me half the truth. 'Tis true, a pilgrimage is a journey. But it is distinctively a journey to a shrine. Now, what was the sacred place towards which the pilgrimage of David was heading? It was to enter the presence of the God whose statutes had become songs to him. That is the man who will enjoy heaven. Not the man to whom the laws of God are burdensome and painful, but he whose delight it is to obey and serve God. To him, even in this world, there come echoes of the songs of heaven. His ears acquire a miraculous power. Why, as he listens, he can hear all the redeemed of heaven singing their songs of triumph. Yes, the statutes of the law have been his song so long that he can catch the songs of the heavenly lands. Christian, as you are now, can you not catch a faint whisper of your dear ones singing in the other world?

Through the harsh voices of our day
A low, sweet prelude finds its way
Through clouds of doubt and creeds of fear.
A light is breaking calm and clear:
That song of love now low and far,
Ere long shall swell from star to star:
That light the breaking day which tips,
The golden-spired Apocalypse.

Mount Hermon as Seen from Damascus



Mennonites Celebrating Easter in Damascus

Wash-day on the Banks of the River Pharpar

She was right. Nearly all the houses are built around open courts. Many of the dwellings are quite pretty inside. The mud walls are plastered and whitened, the bare earth floors are covered with rugs, and great care is taken to adorn the open court. If a house has marble floors, the court is paved with the same, or, at least, has marble walks leading around the flowers and shrubbery. Most houses have a large water basin or a fountain in the centre of this court. Sometimes one can go into a house having a beautiful, clean court, while the narrow, dark street leading to it is so filthy that one can scarcely go through.

The rivers of Damascus, which Naaman preferred to the waters of Jordan, still furnish an abundant water supply. An English engineer told me that at present not more than twenty per cent. of the water is utilized for irrigation, and from what he could gather, from inspecting the ruins of old aqueducts, he believed that the Romans utilized nearly all the water. So the present gardens are probably not one-fourth as large as in Paul's time. Outside the irrigated belt, on the west and north of the city, are raised wheat, barley, and lentils. The crops looked poor, not so much from lack of moisture as from poor tillage. Mount Hermon looms up toward the west, crowned with snow. That great mountain is visible all over this country. The Anti-Lebanon range lies north, while toward the east are the mountains of Arabia. These mountains have no trees.

Damascus claims 240,000 inhabitants, but the Oriental universally overestimates populations. He has no faculty for numbers. He can reckon up to a few dozen, but beyond that a crowd to him is a great multitude, and he may speak of two or three hundred as many thousand. Usually you have to divide the estimated population by two. No census is ever taker that country, and the Turk likes to overestimate inhabitants of a city, to make the taxes appear per capita. An Englishman, who was accustomed estimating populations, recorded Damascus as 100,(

As long as Abana and Pharpar flow and make tl valleys rich, Damascus will have inhabitants; but importance as a great city has passed away. I wal through the foul, narrow streets amid the clamor of natives, and I said to myself, "Can it be that this is city I have read so much about, that I have so of conceived of in my mind's eye and have longed so m to see? It is only a great rubbish heap, and these n houses spring up like mushrooms." Then the word the prophet came to me: Isa. 17:1, 5, 6.

Who knows but this that I see is but that wh remains for the gleaning?

ONCE LIFE-GUARDSMAN, NOW EVANGELIST

ONE of the most interesting figures in evangelistic work at the present time is Mr. W. R. Lane of London, who has been spending the summer in the United States addressing large audiences in New York City, at Northfield and Winona, and in other places. Mr. Lane is associated with Gipsy Smith, under the National Council of the Evangelical Free Churches in Great Britain. From September, 1906, to June, 1907, he held missions in twenty-one different centres in England. His life story reads like a romance.

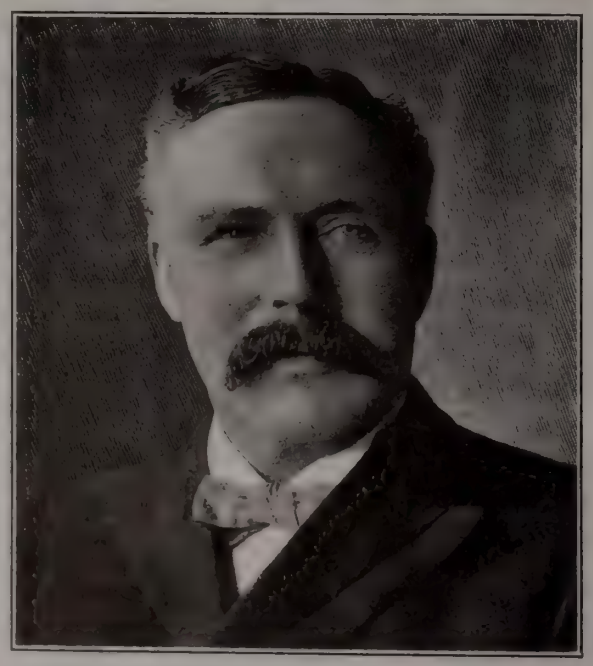
Born of godly parents and reared under religious influences, he wandered far from his home and early teachings while yet a lad, and only after a unique experience did he return to the ways of righteous living.

"I would like to say for the encouragement of Sunday School teachers who are working among boys," said Mr. Lane in telling his experience, "that in all my life I never forgot the teachings I received in a little Sunday School that was carried on in a cottage in a village of Kent, in the south of England. It was only a small affair, and the different rooms were used as class rooms. I thank God for the influence of the people there, and for the memory of the good old hymns I learned there. I have heard a good many others since then which I have quickly forgotten, but some of those old songs stop with me yet, having been in my mind these many, many years.

"Before I was eighteen," he continued, "I had made up my mind that when I was tall enough, and strong enough, and had chest enough to come up to the standard, I would go to London and join the Guards. My parents pleaded with me not to go, and spent many hours in prayer over my decision, but I persisted. When the day came on which I left home, my father walked with me some miles to the nearest station, thinking I would weaken at the last, but I did not. I went on, and I thank the Lord that my father and mother lived to see that God was leading, though by a way we knew not then. They lived long enough to see their prayers answered, and their son brought into the faith which they loved and in which they lived.

"I went to London and joined the Coldstream Guards, one of the regiments of the Royal Household Brigade. The first five months passed in the usual way at the recruit barracks. Few civilians have any idea of the temptations surrounding a soldier in a great city. When I joined the regiment in London, I spent days and nights gambling, going from bad to worse on the downward course just as far as I could without being turned out of the army. For two years I continued to go on and on, far from what I knew to be right, while all the time I was being followed by the prayers from home of my father, mother, sisters and brothers.

"While our regiment was doing its turn for six months at Windsor, I sat one afternoon at a card-table in the middle of the big barrack-room, with ten or more men, gambling. Suddenly a hand fell on my shoulder, and there at my side stood a soldier of our battalion, a godly man, with tickets in his hand.



W. R. Lane, the Converted Life-Guardsman

" 'Comrades,' he said, 'I have some cards here I would like to deal out one each to you.'

"We did not know what his cards were, but knowing the man, we felt it was something in the religious line, and they proved to be tickets to a Gospel meeting to be held especially for the Guards in an old schoolhouse.

" 'Lane, come with me,' said the man, with whom I was on friendly terms.

"My luck had been down that afternoon and I had lost what little money I had and was reduced to my last coin. 'Well, here goes my last bit,' I exclaim 'and if I lose I will go with you.'

"I don't know whether my friend prayed tha should lose, but I lost. True to the gaming spiri kept my bet, and attended the meeting, where I fou forty or fifty other guardsmen who had accepted simi invitations. We were addressed by a physician Windsor, a man who with his wife had taken a deep terest in the soldiers. The doctor was not a gr preacher, but he was a man with tremendous conv tions about the Christian life. He reasoned, plead and urged us for a long time, like a brother, like man, like the friend that he was with his heart burde for us, and a great conviction fell on that meeting. saw myself as I had never seen myself before. I s myself in the light of the throne of God. I thought my mother's and father's prayers, of their counsel a example.

"When the meeting closed, as I passed through t door on my way out, a lady spoke to me, and findi that I was convicted, she persuaded me to remain prayer. It had been a long time since I had said prayer. I do not know what I said, but I guess it not matter. I did not go into ecstasy, nor have a great thrills of excitement; but I knew I had sinne and that, by the grace of God and the Holy Spirit, c viction had come and my sin was swept away.

"Then followed the test of taking a stand before t other fellows at the barracks. When I went in on n return, all were in bed except a few playing car They asked me to join, but I declined, and fool around with my trappings until all were in bed and t lights out. Then I knelt and prayed. The next da however, it all came out, and my chums learned t reason for my repeated refusals to join them at t cards.

"Now, the standard of a true Christian is known the barracks by the fact of a man kneeling or not f bedside prayers. So that night everybody waited t to see whether Lane would kneel or not. At last I g my courage up and knelt in the presence of the who room. Of course, boots and bootjacks were thrown me from all sides."

For two years following his conversion, Mr. La remained with his regiment, returning then to civil lif For ten years he dedicated his life to voluntary wo of a religious nature in the poorest districts of Londo Since then he has gone up and down the land, und the auspices of the National Free Church Council, wi ning souls to Christ.

CLOSING DAYS AT MONT-LAWN

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home has now completed its fourteenth year. From a seedling, it has grown into a goodly tree. Its peaceful shade has been cast into nearly thousand little lives. Who would attempt to ure its influence?

is season the Home has sheltered and cared for two thousand little guests. There has been very illness among them, and there have been many nt days and many merry celebrations. In fact, before have all the conditions at the Home been isfactory.

r one thing, there has been an abundant water y. Hitherto, the drought and heat of August brought ty as to sufficient water for the children and the ds. A new well was badly needed. Finally, the hill, below the Home, a well was sunk and dant water gushed forth. That time the help from the valley, not from the hills.

e Saturday and Sunday before Labor Day, and holiday itself, were celebrated continuously. On rday there were the usual romps, games and races, hich no one was ever known to tire. Among the ested visitors that day were a number of Japanese alists from New York, who declared they were amazed and delighted with the CHRISTIAN HERALD e and the work done there.

nday morning brought a bit uiet, but after a generous lay dinner at noon, the sors began to arrive—Dr. lsch first, bringing Rev. Dr. bitt, the "grand old man of yck." He is the pastor who early half a century has had ge of the parish and the ch which he himself organ- Afterward came the mem- e of Dr. Klopsch's household, ging with them Admiral Si bee, who, having taken part the Fourth of July celebra- , enjoyed himself so much h he wanted to come again. N t came Mr. Charles Alexan- the singing evangelist, who been all round the world w Dr. Torrey, preaching, te hing, and singing the Gos- p in many lands. With him w his singing companion, Mr. H kness, the young Australian c vert. Then came the people, w king and riding, pouring in fm Nyack and the neighbor- towns and country. They c e in such numbers that one w dered if even Mont-Lawn's c acious hospitality would be e al to the occasion. But of c rse it was.

The beautiful chapel was f ly filled even before the c ldren got in. With the organ p ying, the long line of little folks filed into the house worship in perfect order. It was wonderful to see w well they conducted themselves, especially as some them were new arrivals of only two days before!

There was a hymn, a little talk by Dr. Klopsch, a yer by Evangelist Alexander, and then the good stor Babbitt rose to address the children. It is a autiful thing to see a man who has lived through so ny long years of human experience with a face so eet, and clear, and fresh; with a figure so straight d slender, a voice so gentle, a faith so undimmed. It de the hearers think of a time when childhood and l age would not be far apart, but only names for ose who were pure and hopeful, reverent and at peace th God.

Dr. Babbitt spoke to the children about character ilding, about good boys and girls, and bad girls and ys, good acts and bad acts, good men and bad men, d how inevitably the good came to their reward and the hers to their punishment. He pointed out that the ildren before him were at the beginning of the road life, and how important it was for them to choose be- een good and evil and, cleaving to the one, destroy e power of the other, so that they might enjoy happy d useful lives. His words might have been summed in these beautiful lines, "Sow an act and reap a bit; sow a habit, reap a character; sow a character, d reap a destiny."

After he had finished there was more Gospel singing. here is no mistaking the spirit in which that singing is done! If every good and healthy thing could be done with the same enthusiasm, how this old world would ring!

"How many children here, whether American, Italian, Greek, German, Swedish, or anything else, are going to be good American citizens and a credit to this country?" How the hands shot into the air and waved and wig-wagged—those hundreds of rough, earnest little hands!

Again, when they gave the oath of allegiance to the flag, what eagerness they expressed!

Then, forming in line again, the children marched to the sloping lawn in front of the main cottage and sat down in platoons upon the grass. The visitors were seated nearer to the house on benches brought from the pavilion by many willing hands. Dr. Klopsch invited Admiral Sigsbee to speak. The Admiral, with his erect, soldierly bearing, and his clean-cut naval appearance, walked up to the cottage steps and spoke for a few minutes.

He told how the boys at Annapolis, when he was a "middy" there, always despised a liar. A boy might do a great many undesirable things, but they were not laid up against him; but once let him be caught in a lie, and his career was finished. Even when he went from the Academy into the Navy, the stigma of "liar" followed him. "The worst thing about a lie," the Admiral said, "is that, to be believed, it must counterfeit truth; in other words, it must impose upon the credulity, the trustfulness, the regard of some one. Therefore it always does double damage; it injures the one who utters it, and first deceives and then hurts the one who listens to it. There are times," the Admiral added, "when wisdom bids us hold back all of the truth, because people might not be able to understand it; but there never was a time when it was right or excusable to tell a lie."

The Children Crowding Up to Greet the Visitors at Mont-Lawn

The Admiral's talk was followed by hearty cheers. Then Mr. Alexander, making a platform of the piazza railing, led the singing, intermingling it with his little talks and evangelistic stories to the great delight of the whole audience. Then he broke into the famous "Glory Song":

Oh, that will be glory for me: glory for me, glory for me!
When by His grace I shall look on his face,
That will be glory, be glory for me.

It didn't take the crowd long to learn that chorus. It is a favorite one with Mr. Alexander, and he has made it familiar around the world.

He next sang the beautiful Gospel song, "Tell Mother I'll Be There," and many an eye was wet with tears. He told how in rough mining camps, where the men's hearts seemed hardened to every good influence, that song, with its appeal to their love for their mothers, would bring them sobbing to confess their desire to be better men.

The little service ended with the whole audience singing "The Old Time Religion." This greatly pleased the visitors, for many of them had not heard it for years.

When the service was finished, Mr. Alexander asked everyone to shake hands with his neighbor, and so amid smiles and handshakings and little conversations and much good-will the visitors departed, leaving Mont-Lawn to the children and the sunset and the fast-falling twilight.

Monday morning it rained steadily and copiously. Every one blessed the rainy-day pavilion, and wondered how they ever got along without it. At noon Tuller and Meredith, the singing evangelists, arrived, and also a number of guests. Because of the rain the helpers and guests had to eat inside, and by the time all were fed it was three o'clock. Meanwhile the children had been listening to some of Dr. Klopsch's stories out in the pavilion, and although their pent-up energy made them move about considerably, their interest was held and kept. By the time all were ready for the chapel, the sun had put in an appearance.

In the chapel, the two evangelists, Tuller and Meredith, talked and sang, and taught the children some new choruses. The two composers had made up a new and very pretty song for the children while it was still raining. They sat on the piazza together at the piano, and their impromptu efforts resulted in a song of which this was the chorus:

Keep sweet, keep sweet,
It matters not what troubles you may meet.
Through the sunshine or the rain,
All will come out right again,
If you'll only just keep sweet.

This was learned and rendered with great delight by the children.

Dr. Klopsch told a story of Admiral Farragut, and to all who are accustomed to the idea of the dignified, loyal patriot and soldier it comes with a sharp and interesting moral. At ten years of age, Farragut, so he declares himself, "drank like a fish, smoked like a chimney and swore like a trooper." One day his father, who was the captain of a ship, called him into a room and, after closing the door, looked at the boy steadily and sternly and said:

"David, what do you expect to be when you grow up?"

"Why," said David with a swagger, "captain of a ship, like you."

"Well," returned the father, "if you go on as you have begun, you'll never see the inside of a captain's cabin. You'll be a common reprobate of a sailor. You'll be shipped before the mast, and kicked by every man on board."

With this strong statement, the father left the room, giving young David the opportunity of thinking it over. He reflected carefully upon what his father had said, and it dawned upon him that it was the very truth of the matter. From that day, he mended his ways, joined the church, and finally became one of the greatest and most distinguished officers the American Navy has ever had.

So the last week came and went at Mont-Lawn, and one by one the closing days passed. Teachers, helpers, children, have all benefited by this season's experiences and all look forward with grateful hearts to carrying what they have gained into their daily lives and sharing it with others. EUPHEMIA HOLDEN.

A Busy C. E. Society

DEAR MR. EDITOR: The Mothers' Christian Endeavor Society of the First Presbyterian Church of Topeka, Kan., has taken up as a special part of its work the providing of flowers for sick-rooms and for the caskets of the dead. We hold regular semi-monthly meetings and find them a pleasurable source of profit and social enjoyment. We aim to hold ourselves always ready to do our part in any good work for the advancement of the kingdom. This year we have undertaken the support of a Korean Bible woman, as a memorial of the late Mrs. Mary B. Clellan, a former president of our society. On Friday we sent a package to the children of Mont-Lawn, which we hope will help a little. We would be pleased to receive the address of any other similar Mothers' C. E. Society.

MRS. MINNIE B. SCOTT.

Will Peace Win at The Hague?

THERE is a breeze of inspiration in the news from The Hague, that the entire American plan for a World's Peace Court, with the exception of one detail, has won the approval of the examining committee which has had Mr. Choate's proposition under consideration. The single point still in doubt is the paragraph relating to the allotment of judges.

Some time ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave expression to the general hope among peace-lovers throughout the world that the emergency at The Hague might develop a true champion of peace, fearless, eloquent, able; the "one great strong man" who would keep constantly before the Conference the world's desire for that still distant time, when—

> All men's good
> Be each man's rule, and universal peace
> Lie like a shaft of light across the land.

Mr. Choate's powerful advocacy has the right ring. He has shown himself a champion of courage and skill. Foot by foot and inch by inch, he has contended in the arena with the trained diplomats of Europe, until he has secured for America's project of a Permanent Peace Court a fair hearing. He has succeeded in convincing the Conference that the demand for the establishment of such a Court is a universal one, and that it should be called into existence in the interests of justice and civilization. His closing appeal on September 5 deserves to be remembered as marking the most important act of the Conference. He suggested that the judges be elected by the whole Conference voting by States, each State exercising absolute equality and each nation taking its chances of a successful canvass among the delegates—in a word, the plan followed in our own national conventions. He said:

> So sure am I that the establishment of this Court would be a great triumph for civilization and justice, and an effectual guarantee for the peace of the world, that I urge with all the earnestness of which I am capable the adoption of one of the provisional schemes now suggested. If no permanent method for choosing judges can now be agreed upon, I trust that, laying aside all national differences, all pride of opinion and all desire to secure special advantages for our respective nations, we will devote ourselves with one mind and heart to the solution of the problem.

Following this appeal, a committee was appointed to consider the method of allotting judges — the only point of difference. On that committee are Marshal von Bieberstein, the Emperor of Germany's representative; President Baron Nelidoff, the representative of the Czar; M. Bourgeois, for France; Count Tornielli, for Italy; Dr. Barboza, for Brazil, and Mr. Choate and his associate, Mr. James Brown Scott, for the United States.

Such are the steps that have thus far been taken by the representatives of the assembled nations looking to the formation of "The International Court of Arbitral Justice." So much has been successfully accomplished that we may reasonably indulge the hope that American statesmanship will carry the whole scheme through triumphantly, and that the long-hoped-for Peace Court may soon be an established fact.

The Value of Character

EVERY young man may learn some truth from the words uttered by Governor Hughes of New York in the course of his recent speech at Buffalo. There is a tendency in these days to seek advancement and prominence by showy qualities, by wealth or by oratorical efforts. The young man is liable to be misled by the praises accorded to a superficial nature which has the faculty of winning a temporary popularity. It was well therefore that the Governor dwelt on the importance of character in private and public life. He said:

"It is a significant and gratifying characteristic of the American people that, more than the particular benefit conferred by service, they prize the virtues of character, which in the course of service are exemplified. Fidelity to friendship, the exquisite grace of a husband's devotion, the honor of manhood, the beauty of the forbearance of unwearied patience, always win for a man a place in the hearts of his fellow citizens, and in their memory eclipse the glories of an administration flattering to American pride. We may see but dimly into the future. We may be confused by the perplexities of our modern life, made the more difficult by the very riches of our inheritance; but as we set our course by the pole-star of truth and justice, and conserve the ideals of character which our fathers have taught us to revere, we shall not fail."

Many preachers have proclaimed the same truths with an application wider than our own borders, for it is the truth of the Bible, and applies to all races and all times; but it will impress the young man of our time more for coming from the lips of a statesman. Governor Hughes has had a wide experience of city life, and this is the lesson he deduces from his observations. He holds that the confidence of the American is given not so much to men of notable gifts, to men of smartness, nor even so much to the man who renders public service, as to men of sterling character, of fidelity, integrity, and honor. These qualities are within the reach of everyone, however humble; and whether they win popularity or not, are a possession more to be desired than rank or riches or power.

Religion by Seasons

AS thoughtful observers watched the American people during the vacation season that has just drawn to a close, the idea must have come that there are many well-meaning individuals who are church members and prominent in their home communities, who have seasons for living a religious life. The general relaxation that comes with the heat of summer, the desire to go to some resort and change for a while the usual routine of existence, seems to be their excuse for putting by their religious duties as they put by their winter garments. The result is unfortunate for the people themselves and for those with whom they come in contact.

No one has had any spiritual uplift or has truly had any religious experience worthy of the name if he finds his religion burdensome. The happiest people in the world are Christians, or at any rate they should be. Those whose example is worth following believe that the duties they took up with their conversion have added greatly to the happiness of their lives, and they would not forget them if they could.

There have been no churches so empty, in many instances, during the past summer as those at some of our best resorts where hundreds of church members gathered for their vacation. "We will go to church when we get home; we are here to rest now," was the excuse offered. Yet these same people would probably be greatly shocked and highly indignant were they asked if they found it uncomfortable to keep in touch with the uplifting and refining influence of religion through twelve months of the year, and so had left it home with their winter clothes.

The English Bishops' Visit

THE Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, in October next, is to celebrate at Richmond, Va., the three hundredth year of its existence here. To the General Convention all the bishops come, with clergymen and laymen from all the dioceses, who are supposed to speak and act for all that is best in their church. To these must be added the representatives of the English church, who come to bring greeting, and also a Bible from the King of England, for the pulpit of the church where service was first held by a celebration of the Holy Communion. For this Bible to rest upon, President Roosevelt has given a brass lectern or reading desk.

Three distinguished men come to speak for British churchmen: Bishop Jacob of St. Albans, Bishop Montgomery, head of the missionary work, and the Bishop of London; all able men with great records for work in many fields—Jacob as wrangler in his university and for parish work seldom equaled, and Montgomery for mission work abroad as well as at home. A very large share of public attention will be given to the Bishop of London. He was a slum worker, a great workingman's man, a famous scholar, a friend of King Edward, and an out-of-door preacher of wide reputation. Recently he preached to a London crowd in a pouring rain. He is hailed by his countrymen as the herald of a new race of bishops and one of the first in a race of evangelists. He and Bishops Knox, Pearson and Thornton have in the last three years led the way in a struggle to reach the masses who do not go to church. Bishop Ingram is a member of the House of Lords. He is probably more at home in Bethnal Green among the toiling throngs. This man comes to meet in this New World men of his own and of other faiths. It will be deeply interesting to see what American churchmen will do with all of these distinguished men. We shall watch their steps with interest. Are they to be wined and dined a made social lions of, or are they to be received prophets of God, men with a message from the King kings?

The bishops will find in American church life a kind unity they will not see at home—a sweetness which ri out of our religious freedom. They will find, from co to coast, men and women ready and anxious to list to an earnest voice, which shall ring out in clarion to the law of God, and shall say to the wicked man, "R pent, believe and live;" ready for a ministry which sh proclaim Jesus Christ in his person, office and work, a in his life and death for sinners. If the bishops rise these heights, the people will listen. It is a good si that the Bishop of London has promised to preach f the Rev. William Wilkinson in Wall Street. Here will find a congregation worthy of his best. It is mu to be desired that he should also visit such missions that in the Bowery, for in this way the bishop may get comprehensive view of all conditions.

Nothing but good can come of these visits of disti guished church workers. It is not as courtiers or schola or statesmen that we look to them, but as chief missio aries in the Church of God, who will speak the everla ing truth of the salvation of Jesus Christ for all w believe in him. This is the real vital message the wor wants to-day.

Fierce War in Morocco

WHILE the Peace Conference is sitting at The Hague, a fierce conflict in Morocco is proving an effective illustration of the miseries of war. It pathetic to read of the white-robed horsemen rushing to attle chanting the words of the Koran and falling here the withering fire of the French machine guns. On September 2 the Moors made a desperate attack on the French lines, and for a time succeeded in driving the enemies back. The Moors had evidently been reinforced, and they attacked in such force as to surprise the French. Gen. Drude speedily sent assistance, which turned the tide, but the French general in command was killed, with a large number of his men. There are reports also of a massacre at Mazagan, and a warship has been sent to bombard that town. It is evident that the French occupation is doing more harm than good. It is too small to overawe the Moors, and by its weakness encourages them to continue hostilities; yet the French government cannot increase its forces without incurring the hostility of Germany. A mere expedition to avenge the massacre at Casablanca is useless. Any interference short of a complete subjugation of the country involves a continuance of the struggle and inevitable bloodshed.

That there must be subjugation eventually, cannot be doubted by anyone who is familiar with local conditions. The Moorish government is incapable of maintaining order, or of compelling its own subordinates to do their duty. The Moorish governors tolerate disorder if they do not connive at it and share in the booty. A case in point is the scene pictured on this page. In the city prison a number of Jews are thrust with great violence. Their houses and stores had previously been looted. No charges are made against them, and the only complaint made about them is that they did not surrender their property on demand of the mob. If any of the Jewish prisoners are suspected of having money or valuables concealed, they are subjected to the "hot torture," which consists in fastening the right hand behind the back. It is enclosed in a leather wallet, in which salt is placed. The Jew feels his hand shrinking day by day, and if he really has the money, gives it up to save his hand from becoming permanently useless. A government which tolerates such horrors is a disgrace to humanity. If it does not alter its ways, the public opinion of the world will insist on its abolition.

Scene in the Torture Chamber of a Prison in Morocco

There is a generation whose teeth are as swords, and their jaw teeth as knives, to devour the poor from off the earth. (Prov. 30: 14.)

The Quebec Disaster

General consternation among engineers and bridge builders in this country and Canada was caused on August 29 by the collapse of the great cantilever bridge over the St. Lawrence River at Levis, near Quebec. The bridge was to be a mile and a half in length, and half of it from the south shore to midstream, suddenly crumpled up and dropped into the river, carrying down all the workmen then upon it, numbering, it is believed, eighty men. The whistle had just blown for the men to quit for the day, when there was a horrible grinding sound from the extended section, and the cry was raised: "The bridge is falling!" The farthest section, as it fell, dragged others after it, the snapping girders booming like artillery. The ironwork nearest shore fell into shallow water, and such workmen as were on that section all were not crushed were rescued, but those in the extended portion are believed to have all perished. The cause of the disaster is still a mystery. The most competent authorities say that "the work was carried on more scientifically, more accurately, than usual." The bridge was started seven years ago and was expected to cost ten million dollars. It was the most ambitious structure of its kind ever attempted. The main span, which was to be 1,800 feet long, had not been begun; it was the anchor of the first cantilever that carried the structure to the point where the span was to begin that failed. The calamity is not only grievous in itself, but is disquieting; for many bridges in various parts of the world are built on the same principle. Evidently there must either have been an error in the calculations of the engineers, or a defect in the material, but the men responsible in both cases insist that the blame is not with them. We have to learn that not only in such undertakings, but in the spiritual world and in morals, the noblest human powers are liable to err.

Trust in the Lord with all thine heart; and lean not unto thine own understanding. (Prov. 3: 5.)

Lost in the Alps

An extraordinary story is told by a Swiss lady who has been a prisoner for twenty days in a cave of the Alps. She says that she set out for a walk by herself, intending to return to her hotel for lunch. Fascinated by the scenery, she penetrated further up the gorge and lost her way. In her wandering she slipped and fell a long distance, alighting in a cave. At first she congratulated herself on not being dashed to pieces, but in a short time she feared that she was reserved for the worse fate of dying by starvation. There was no way of egress from the cave but from above, and when she attempted to climb she found the steep sides were too slippery to give her any foothold. She shouted for help at intervals all that day and night until she was too hoarse to hear her own voice. She became intensely hungry and thirsty. Some water was trickling through the rock, which she drank, and there was a kind of moss growing on the side of the cave that alleviated the pangs of hunger. She had plenty of money in her purse, but she would gladly have given it all for a mouthful of bread. She was in that living tomb twenty days. When found by a peasant, she was almost a skeleton and was quite demented. He carried her to a hospital, where she is slowly recovering. She will never forget that fearful ordeal. Her situation, with abundant money at command, yet liable to perish with hunger, is a lesson that we in these times need to learn: that there are times when boundless wealth cannot deliver us.

Riches profit not in the day of wrath: but righteousness delivereth from death. (Prov. 11: 4.)

A Hunt for a Germ

An epidemic of infantile paralysis has broken out in New York State, which has started bacteriologists on a scientific hunt. Within a radius of two hundred miles of New York City a large number of children have fallen victims. In one city hospital alone there are more than one hundred such cases. The symptoms are peculiar. The child has a high fever, becomes restless, and after a day or two develops a peculiar weakness and gradually becomes prostrate. It does not move and suffers pain when disturbed. After three or four days there is a change. Some of the muscles resume their power, but others, usually those of the arms or of the legs, remain permanently paralyzed. No way has yet been found of curing the little sufferers. Dr. Terriberry, the neurologist of a large hospital, is convinced that the disease proceeds from a germ, and with a view to discovering it, he has issued a circular to physicians in towns and villages throughout the country, asking them to report full particulars of any case in their practice. It is a coincidence that a European physician announces a new discovery regarding germs. He has found that germs of every kind, even the deadly diphtheritic germ, is killed in from two to ten minutes by direct sunlight. Hitherto the germs have been placed in glass tubes for experiment, but this bacteriologist has found that they gain power of resistance in that way, but die quickly when the rays of the sun strike them without an intervening medium. Our medical men are continually making discoveries, but for the great evil that afflicts the whole world there can be no new remedy found. Now, as in all time past, the only sure remedy is that which God has provided:

Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings. (Mal. 4: 2.)

Worship of Our Statue

The Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, which is so prominent a feature of New York harbor, was the object of worship on a Chinese vessel a few days ago. The Braemar of the Warrack Line entered the harbor from Chinese ports. No sooner was the statue sighted, than from forecastle and engine hold the Chinese swarmed on deck, kowtowing and flourishing joss sticks. The Chinese quartermaster explained that his countrymen believed the towering bronze lady was a goddess of the Buddha type and they were confirmed in the belief by the serenity of countenance she maintained in the midst of the marvelous activity. A further confirmation was in reserve. The sun had set and twilight was falling as the joss sticks were burning down, when they saw the electric light in Miss Liberty's torch suddenly begin to glow as if in response to the adoration of her worshipers. The response gratified them and they went back to their duties fully satisfied. We understand why the torch of the statue became luminous. Their misunderstanding of the coincidence was natural, and better informed people often make a similar mistake.

Since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, we have wanted all things and have been consumed. (Jer. 44: 18.)

A Man Without a Country

The Atlantic liner New York, which entered New York harbor last week from Cherbourg, France, received a visit from detectives sent down the bay to meet her. They examined the passengers and selected one whom they took to headquarters. He was an American citizen, but having been convicted of felony here his rights were forfeited. He went to England some three years ago and was convicted there of conspiracy to defraud. He served a sentence of eighteen months' imprisonment and at its conclusion he received notice from the English government that he must leave the country. He chose to go to France, whence at the first opportunity he sailed for America. He was astonished when he was seized on the New York by the police, and seemed to think there was no place on earth where he would be free from arrest. It is a terrible fate for a man to bring upon himself. To be cast out by one land and another, and to know that wherever he goes, the hand of the law may seize him.

There is no darkness nor shadow of death where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. (Job 34: 22.)

Questions and Answers

J. R., Pittsburg, Pa. What is the probable object in displacing the veteran captains and putting young men in command of the warships about to proceed to the Pacific?

It is said to be in pursuance of a plan to introduce a new system of retirement "for age in grade," as it is technically called in the service. The Navy Department doubtless believes it a good plan to push young men to the front, as being most likely to be serviceable in an emergency. We do not think any special significance is to be attached to the incident, however.

Mrs. C. E. P., St. Louis, Mo. Is there any country on the earth where the Gospel of the Kingdom has not been proclaimed?

We believe there are still great tracts in Africa, and whole provinces in China, ungospelized; also, practically all of Tibet, parts of Turkestan and Arabia, and considerable sections of South America.

S. S., Princeton, N. J. When was the first temperance society organized and by whom?

The first temperance society was probably that of the Rechabites (see Jer. 35). There were also temperance societies among the Jews and Romans. In modern times John Wesley was the pioneer of temperance reform, and laid down the principles of the movement in his "General Rules" (1743) in which he designated drunkenness, and the buying or selling or drinking of spirituous liquors, as sins to be scrupulously avoided. The first temperance society in the United States was organized in Saratoga County, N. Y., in 1808, and was called "The Union Temperance Society of Moreau and Northumberland." Members pledged themselves not to drink, sell or give drink, under a penalty of twenty-five cents. For cases of intoxication the fine was fifty cents. The Massachusetts Society was formed in Boston in 1813. The Father Mathew movement came in 1845-50.

J. W., Wetmore, Kan. Does the New Testament forbid the marriage of a Christian with one who is not a Christian?

It is Paul who gives direct teaching on the subject. He says (II. Cor. 6: 14), "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers," etc. In the case of the Corinthians such a union must have been exceedingly uncongenial, as the unbeliever was usually an idolater. The disparity is not so marked in our day, but it is sufficient still to produce a lack of real harmony. Religion should be to the Christian the first and fundamental element of life. To have a partner who has no sympathy with it is to raise a barrier between the two which keeps them separate in the highest and holiest spheres of life. Generally it leads to the Christian forsaking his faith.

R. O., Scottsville, Kan. 1. When do the regular sessions of Congress commence? 2. Who are the members of President Roosevelt's present cabinet? 3. Who is the President of Cuba?

1. The first Monday in December, though the terms of the members date from the fourth of March. The Congress which meets the month following the November election is not composed of the men who have just been chosen as representatives, but is the previous Congress which is holding its second or "short session," after its successor has been chosen. The exact length of a session is not arbitrarily set. 2. The cabinet is made up as follows: Secretary of State, Elihu Root, of N. Y.; Secretary of the Treasury, George B. Cortelyou, of N. Y.; Secretary of War, William H. Taft, of Ohio; Attorney-General, Charles J. Bonaparte, of Md.; Postmaster-General, George von L. Meyer, of Mass.; Secretary of the Navy, Victor H. Metcalf, of Calif.; Secretary of the Interior, James R. Garfield, of O.; Secretary of Agriculture, James Wilson, of Ia.; Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Oscar S. Straus, of N. Y. 3. There is no president of Cuba. A new one will be chosen to administer the government, after the present temporary occupation of the island by the United States is at an end.

Mrs. Nancy V., Alton, N. H., writes:

In your issue of August 28 is an article in which reference is made to the ascension robes of the Millerites. I was born in 1842, of Millerite or Second Advent parents, and have attended Second Advent meetings, more or less, all my days. I have also heard them speak of the false reports circulated, stating that they made white robes themselves and went out somewhere to meet the Lord. I never knew any one who put on a white robe for that day, neither did I ever talk with any one that saw or knew of its being done.

E. C., Carbondale, Penn. When did the change occur in Jacob's character—at Bethel or at Jabbok?

The change at Bethel was extremely slight. Jacob regarded his vision very much as a business arrangement. If God would help him and give him bread to eat and bring him back safe, then God should be his God and he would give him a tenth of all. At Jabbok the crisis was much more effective. He realized there his danger and his need of a blessing. He no longer bargained with God, he saw that his own strength was futile, he was a humble suppliant for God's favor. From that night on he was a different man, by no means perfect, but far better than before.

M. A. McG., Navasota, Tex. 1. How many professing Christians are there in the world? 2. How many missionaries are there in heathen lands supported by Evangelical Christians?

1. The number of Christians in the world, according to M. Fournier de Flaix, an expert statistician, is 477,080,158. 2. The American Board's summary of the various denominations places the number of missionaries at 12,789. Of these 6,750 are men and 6,039 women. Besides these there are 70,735 native laborers employed.

M. L. W., Santa Monica, Calif. What is the Esperanto language?

Esperanto is an international language invented by Dr. L. L. Zamenhof, of Warsaw, Poland. The first book of the language was published in 1887. Its grammar has been translated into some twenty-eight languages, and about twenty monthly journals are devoted to its propaganda. It has no irregular verbs, and its grammar is very simple. Its merits have been recognized by Professor Max Muller, Count Tolstoy, Sir William Ramsay, and others. The American Esperantist, published in Boston, is the leading Esperantist organ in the United States.

I. H., Lewisburg, Pa. Is the Lutheran doctrine of the Lord's Supper identical with the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Mass? If not, wherein do they differ?

They are not identical and we think that many Lutherans go further than did Luther himself in emphasizing the difference. Briefly stated, the Roman Catholic doctrine is that "the elements of bread and wine are by the consecration of the p changed as to their essence, or tran stantiated, into the actual body and b of Christ, while the visible form and pearance of bread and wine remain to sight, touch and taste." Luther reje the idea of transubstantiation, but su tuted another idea, which is knowt consubstantiation. In this he held co-existence of body and blood in, and under the bread and wine." Thu differed with Calvin, who held that t was a spiritual real presence, the frui of which came not by the mouth, but faith alone. The practical difference tween Luther and the Roman Catholi that Luther held that "the elements not to be adored, being for use, not s ship." Again, the Roman Catholic pr gives only the bread to the laity, w Lutherans give both bread wine.

"Queen Titania" and Her Court at the Asbury Park Parade

ONE of the events of the summer at Asbury Park, N. J., is the Annual Baby Parade. This year it was witnessed by at least 100,000 spectators. Nearly 700 babies were in line, in nine divisions. There were nine sets of twins, including a pair raised in an incubator. The prize baby was Dolly Herzog, a twenty months old New Yorker. There were many subsidiary prizes. In the parade were divisions for doll express wagons, baby coaches and go-carts, children in fancy dress, babies in college colors, wee youths and maidens in burlesque make-ups, floats and pony turnouts. The division devoted to children in costumes was the largest in the line. Miss Jessie May Hazelrigg was the "Queen Titania," and her court was composed of children from New Jersey, Florida, New York, Illinois, Maryland, Pennsylvania and other States.

e Family Medicine Chest

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

HE less we have to do with medicine, doubtless, the better it is, unless it is prescribed by a doctor in whom we have confidence; yet there are simple remedies that every family should on hand in case of an emergency. For example, be scratched, bruised or bitten, and no physician mediately at hand, a supply of turpentine will save pse and trouble. Any wound made by a cutting ument or a wire should be instantly cleansed as oughly as possible, after which an application of rentine will often be found to have wonderful healgvirtue. This admirably effective agent, one of ture's own remedies, has its use in driving away pain helissipating congestion; and when it is a question of oing rather than of the body itself, it can exercise nce in removing paint. Nothng more annoying than to have gment marred by contact with red paint, and turpentine surasses most other liquids in its wer of prompt removal. A comfort laundress declares that she ds a dash of turpentine in the ter with which she washes colred fabrics, as turpentine sets the olor. This article, therefore, hould be kept in the family medicine chest not only, but also in the ter room with other domestic upplies.

y household should ever find itself destitute of a good extract of witch hazel, of tincture of arnica, spirits of camphor, linseed oil, lime water, absorbent cotton, surgical bandages and soft old linen. A stitch in time saves nine. When it is necessary to give prompt aid to the injured, people cannot always wait with safety until they can send an order to the druggist or get word to the physician, who may be miles away on his daily round.

Occasionally one meets thrifty people who do not like to throw away the remains of a doctor's prescription in pills, powders or liquids, and who carefully reserve for future use a specific remedy that has served its term in an illness. If, however, one is ill enough to require the good offices of a doctor, one should on the return of health dispose of the medicines suited to that exigency and not use private judgment in taking them again. There may easily be degrees of difference sufficiently marked to make perilous at one time that which was valuable at another. This caution is superfluous in reference to time-honored standard remedies, such as essence of peppermint or of ginger, aromatic spirits of ammonia and spirits of red lavender. Every vial and jar in the family medicine chest should be plainly and conspicuously labeled, and it is the part of wisdom to keep a candle and a small tin box of matches beside it, so that there may be no temptation to trust to any sense except to that of sight when resorting to the chest in the dark.

Very valuable lives have been sacrificed through the hasty and heedless snatching at remedies without looking at their labels. For example, some years ago a man whose life was extremely useful and very happy, a man well known to thousands, reached in the dark for a quinine powder that he supposed to be on a stand beside his bed and swallowed instead a deadly poison that had been prepared for the extermination of annoying rats. He lived just long enough to inform a member of his family that he had made a fatal mistake. There are flashlights that are quicker and more convenient than a candle and that cost comparatively little, in portable electric lamps that may be illumined at a touch, carried in a pocket, and charged again with electric fluid when exhausted. Nature left to herself will cure many ills, and continual tampering with medicines is fraught with danger and allied to folly. But there are days when liniments and salves have their proper place and when a simple remedy gives nature the needed spur. Our grandmothers never thought of keeping house without a well-stocked medicine chest, and in large families the doctor's bill at the end of a twelvemonth was very small in comparison to what it is when he is sent for on every slight occasion.

* * *

The mistress of a Southern plantation before the Civil War often had under her care several hundred servants who looked to her for nursing in illness, relief in pain, and care in case of accident. This gentlewoman, as maternal in her tenderness to her black dependents as to her own children, was never found unprovided in an emergency, and always knew what to do when man, woman or child was in trouble. Her medicine chest was a part of her outfit for comfortable home life. It should be this on a smaller scale in the thought of every homemaker.

It may be added that in the same closet with the medicine chest, or somewhere else easily accessible, there should be kept a large-sized bottle of disinfectant, to be freely used whenever there is an indication of putrefaction or poisonous sewerage. In this connection it is as well to say that some deadly gases do not advertise themselves even to an acute sense of smell, and that the only absolutely safe precaution against malignant germs is radical cleanliness, and plenty of fresh air and light.

Who Steals My Purse

"WHO steals my purse steals trash." Nevertheless, as the feeling of resentment and vindictiveness that springs up on discovering that a pick-pocket has relieved one of one's car-fare, change or weekly earnings is perfectly natural, and, on the whole, justifiable. Those obliged to go about great cities are often taught by bitter experience that it is unsafe to carry much money on the person. The safer way is to be provided with just enough to meet current expenses in traversing the distance from point to point, leaving the item of paying for purchases to be attended to at home. In crowded shops and thronged thoroughfares there is opportunity for the adroit thief to seize his booty and carry it away undiscovered. It is an open question whether or not certain popular books that are undoubtedly amusing, such as The Bishop's Carriage and The Amateur Cracksman, do not throw a glamour over theft and cause it to wear a halo in the eyes of the young.

Charles Dickens, when he drew his inimitable picture of Fagan, made theft hideous, as indeed it should be. In the clever story of the girl who secreted herself in the carriage of a distinguished bishop, leading him to fancy that she had supposed it to be that of her father, the reader is a little in danger of overlooking the criminality of the daring young adventuress on account of her audacity and charm. It is as well not to present vice to any one in the guise of an angel of light.

When money is stolen there is a chance that it may be recovered. The thief may have qualms of conscience and return the purse, or may drop it where the loser can pick it up. If it be irreparably gone, the person robbed may have more cash on which to draw, may have friends in need who will give timely help, or may bravely go to work to earn more money. "Who steals my purse steals trash."

Whoever, going a step further, ventures into the realm of the intangible and defames character, assails reputation by aspersion, hint or innuendo, casts a slur on young or old, is a far worse robber than a highwayman of the past or a sneak-thief of the present. Fortunately, among decent people there are very few who descend to calumny and scandal. But there are few communities into which unkind gossip never intrudes. Especially in rural places where little happens and the current of affairs seems to move slowly, there is a tendency, if not a temptation, to think the worst and not the best of neighbors who may be quite innocent of so much as a wrong thought, and here, rather than in larger towns, it is constantly true that the tale-bearer and the whisperer murder friendship.

* * *

While conversation would lose a good deal of spice if the names of our friends and their fortunes good and bad were wholly eliminated, a good rule for us all might be never to say, and if possible, never to think, anything unkind of any one. The living who are absent should be as safe from the shafts of unkind censure as the dead in their tranquil sleep. Wilfully or maliciously to steal away the good character of a friend is a crime of deeper blackness than the opposite one of stealing a purse. Money may be rubbish. Reputation is an asset precious as gold and diamonds. Our words are under our own control. If we cannot find it in our hearts to praise we may refrain, as a usual thing, from blame. To cultivate the habit of thinking kindly as well as of speaking gently is surely the obligation of the Christian.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MOSES

International Sunday School Lesson for September 29

*By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

TWO great personalities tower like Sinai's peaks above all other names in this quarter's lessons, animating and connecting them, the supreme names of history and of heaven. Who are they? They are associated in the "new song" of redeemed millions from all lands in heaven. What is that song? "They sang the song of Moses, the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb." Rev. 15: 3. Surely then the most fitting thread for the review is this: How much did Moses when on earth know of Christ, and how much Gospel may be found in his books in the clearer light of New Testament interpretation?

Putting together all the verbal and actual prophecies and symbols and theophanies that proclaimed Christ in the five books of Moses, we shall get the complete picture of the expected Messiah, so far as it had been outlined up to the time of Moses' death, as from many lithographic stones, adding color upon color, we get a complete portrait to-day. The picture of Christ that Moses had was but a dim sketch at best, as seen in the twilight of his day, but full of significance in the high noon of fulfilment as we look back upon it now when Christ is becoming both Saviour and King of the world.

Christ Portrayed by Moses

To get the full picture of Christ in any Old Testament period we should consider not verbal prophecies only, as is too much the custom, but also three other parallel lines of prophecy and revelation, all parts of one picture, namely: the symbolic Gospel of bloody altars and other types; the acted prophecies, such as the uplifted serpent; and the theophanies, when God visibly appeared to Abraham, Moses and others, and displayed the same characteristics of justice and mercy that were so wonderfully blended in Jesus, when he made his longer New Testament visit to this world. The four kinds of Old Testament pictures should be combined in one composite photograph to give us in full color the Gospel according to Moses.

Even in the Genesis records which Moses received from his predecessors and knew from childhood, he found a faint patriarchal Gospel in promises that not only a Messianic race, but a personal Messianic Ruler and Redeemer, would come from heaven in human form, and save men from sin by suffering. In Mrs. Browning's drama of Exile, after the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise, Christ speaks to them thus:

For at last
I, wrapping round me your humanity,
Which, being sustained, shall neither break nor burn
Beneath the fire of Godhead, will tread earth,
And ransom you and it, and set strong peace
Betwixt you and its creatures. With my pangs
I will confront your sins.

Not all that did Adam and Eve comprehend, though we can hear all that and more in the light of fulfilment, in that "Protoevangelium," that first Gospel, condensed into the single promise spoken by the Jehovah Jesus, when he "walked" and spoke in Eden after the fall (Gen. 3: 8-19), and promised that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, but at the cost of bruising to himself. As the acorn contains the oak, this promise of proclaims even in Eden the suffering Sovereign who is to come, the Saviour King. The next revelation of Christ in the slain lamb of Abel's altar, intensifies the atoning side of Christ's work on the cross of Calvary. Abel's virtue was in seeing and confessing that he had sinned and deserved to die in consequence; confessing also that he accepted the substitute provided in "the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world." That is what joining the church "by confession" means to-day. Let us never say "by profession." Cain's sin was that he refused to offer the sin offering lying at his door (Gen. 4: 7), perhaps presented by Abel for that use. Cain would offer only the bloodless thank offering of flowers and fruits, whose meaning in his case was exactly that of the proud Pharisee, who thanked God he did not need to pray for pardon, being blind to his own faults, which is one of the worst of faults.

Whether or not Noah saw in the ark a type or illustration of Christ as a Saviour, he is to us the Ark of Safety (Gen. 7: 1). Many an Old Testament story is both an historic fact and an acted parable, such acted parables or illustrations by action having been in all ages a common mode of teaching in the Orient. The New Testament, reviewing such events in Old Testament history, says: "These things happened unto them by way of example [literally, for types], and they are written for our admonition upon whom the end of the ages are come (I. Cor. 10: 11; see also v. 6). Noah's altar (Gen. 8: 20), intensifies the scarlet that is put into that early picture of Christ by the reference to bruising and the slain lamb of the prophecies already noted. The Messianic line, which was first drawn in the promise that the future Deliverer should be "the seed of the woman," that is, human on the mother's side, narrows to the line of Shem —"Let God dwell in the tents of Shem" (Gen. 9: 27)—and then repeatedly it is declared that among Shem's descendants Abraham is chosen to be the human progenitor of the Messiah (Gen. 12: 3; 18: 18). Christ said, "Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad" (John 8: 56). When God pointed Abraham to the stars and said, "So shall thy seed be" (Gen. 15: 5), did he see, as we do, one star shining brighter than all the others, the Star of Bethlehem? The visible Jehovah, who with two angel attendants came to Abraham's tent door (Gen. 18: 1-22), must have been the second person of the Trinity, for "No man hath seen God (that is, the Father) at any time; the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him" (John 1: 18).

Preached to Abraham

The Son of God appeared to man in visible form in as many brief visits in the Old Testament times as he spent years on earth in the New Testament days. The Jehovah-Jesus who came to Abraham in his old age and revealed the fearful punishment that awaited Sodom, corresponds in both goodness and severity to the Christ who in the 25th chapter of Matthew hurled at the covetous and hypocritical Pharisees the sevenfold lightning of his seven times uttered "Woe unto you!" but in the same chapter said in a rain of tears: "O Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered you as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings, and ye would not."

Abraham is assured that the Messianic line is to be continued, not in Ishmael, but "in Isaac shall thy seed be called" (Gen. 21:8). Abraham's offering of Isaac was all an acted parable of faith (Gen. 22: 1-19), and however much or little Abraham saw in it, we see a picture of the divine Father who, though he spared Abraham's son, "spared not his own Son, but gave him freely for us all," in fulfilment of the deep words of Abraham to Isaac, "God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering."

Again the Messianic line narrows to Jacob's seed (Gen. 28: 14), rather than Esau's. By the brook Jabbok, Jacob meets the visible Jehovah, as he had met him before at Bethel and Mahanaim. Jacob, however, mistakes Jehovah for an emissary of Esau who has come to slay him, and fights for his life; but at daybreak finds in joy and blessing that he has "seen God face to face (Gen. 32: 22-32). next clear lines of the picture are words of the dying Jacob, pointing continuance of the Messianic line thr Judah (Gen. 49: 10). "The sceptre not depart from Judah, nor the r staff from between his feet, until S come; and unto him shall the obedien the people be."

To get the full Gospel of Moses we add the pictorial Gospel of the Tabern for example, the significance of the offerings, the burnt-offering, the m offering, the sin-offering, the tres offering and the peace-offering.

The Revelation on Sinai

We must also recognize as a part o Gospel of Moses the theophanies of S where the visible Jehovah appeared a once the Teacher, Intercessor and L giver, the Prophet, Priest and King. often overlooked that the Ten Comm ments were first spoken in audible w from Sinai by a divine person who visibly seen by Moses (Ex. 20: 1-19). commands were uttered in thunder to to make the people feel their need of Intercessor. They exclaimed to Mo "Speak thou to us, and we will hear: bu not God speak to us, lest we die." An in Moses they found an intercesso mediator between each sinner and Goo which he foreshadowed Christ, as sugge by his prophecy: "A prophet shall Lord your God raise up unto you unto me; unto him shall ye hearke Like Aaron, Jesus would be Israel's H Priest forever; and like Moses, he wo also be their Teacher and Lawgiver. Ch is a more perfect Prophet, Priest and K who had no lapse of temper, such as s Moses out of the Promised Land, and g the people no laws that even tempora tolerated slavery and divorce "for hardness of their hearts."

Moses was like Christ in greatness—m like him than any other man, as the B indicates when the two names are spo together in the anthem of heaven, " song of Moses and the Lamb." Mo rank as the greatest human lawgive sufficiently shown in that the three gr codes of European law, the corner-sto of the "common law" of Christendo the codes of Justinian, Charlemagne Alfred, are all founded on the laws Exodus, in which nearly all laws have th roots.

Moses a Type

The life of Moses was full of illustrati of Christ. Moses was cradled, like Chr in peril and poverty; was, like him, a pl toiler in his days of preparation for mi try; his commission out of the burni bush corresponds to Christ's at his bapti out of the radiant sky; his words, t were God-given and attested by miracl and selfish crowds were about both, wh low ideals daily tried their souls. T water from the smitten rock symboliz the eternal life that comes from Christ i human souls. The uplifted serpent p tured "life for a look at the Crucifi One" (John 3: 14).

The so-called "Law" we have discover is also Gospel—good news of pard through Jesus the Saviour, and of prote tion and direction through Christ the Kin Sin and salvation are the chief theme The Law itself is a mirror to show us o sinfulness. If salvation is to be by t Law, it must be by full obedience to th Law. The rich young ruler claimed have so obeyed, but when Jesus bade hi give his wealth to the poor and join h disciples in a life of poverty and servic that moral young man found he had vi lated both the first and last commandmen —had put gold above God in his hear and was bound in chains of covetousnes Many another who has no sense of sin an so feels no need of a Saviour, needs to hav the Law, as interpreted by Jesus, applie as an X-ray to show the black spots on h heart that need to be cleansed away. "H that hateth his brother is a murderer, Jesus said. Do I hate any one? "He tha looketh on a woman to lust after her," sai Jesus, "hath committed adultery." Hav I so lusted? He interpreted, "Thou sha not steal," in the broader term, "Defrau not." Have I defrauded by false state ments as to the nature of goods?

Never was there a time here was so bitter a need for the f men to preach Christianity as it is, to preach Christ as the Friend mpathizer, to labor with might and o vindicate religion from the asper- ast upon it, and to tell men that loves them and pities them. Liberal Giving* GIFTS to God, as we learn from Christ's commendation of the widow who cast two mites into the treasury, are estimated not by the amount of them, but by the spirit that prompts them. Two donations on a list may be exactly the same sum, yet may have very different values in God's reckoning. One may have been prompted by pride, or ostentation, or by considerations of prospective advantage, and of it he will say, "They have their reward." The other may come from a genuine spirit of helpfulness and may have involved self-denial, and this is acceptable with God.

Liberality toward God is not limited to the gifts at church collections and contributions to Christian causes. These should not be neglected, for they are indications of the extent of our gratitude for our own spiritual blessings. In proportion as we value them we should give, to enable the church to make this offer known to others. No means of usefulness should lack our support, and the methodical man will take them all into consideration in apportioning the funds he has available. But there ought always to be a reserve for personal charity. No man should give to the church all that he has to give. He has need in his own soul of the exercise of personal giving. It is easy to hand his money to a treasurer and say: "Distribute this for me." It saves him trouble, but it deprives him of a blessing. He should see for himself the need of his brother, and have the gratification of supplying that need. He ought not to wait for his brother to apply to him, but should consider the spectacle of want a direct call to him. It may lead to his giving not only the two pence which the Samaritan gave the innkeeper, but of the lending of the beast that bore the wounded man, and the binding up of the wounds.

It is a significant fact that such help does get a reward even in this world. God sees that a liberal man may be trusted with money and he blesses him and trusts him with more. Not the man who carefully reckons his tenth and charges against it every cent he gives and never exceeds that tenth is the man after God's heart, but he whose heart is open always and who does not stay to calculate whether any of the tenth is left, but gives freely and promptly, is the man who is blessed.

A MARTYR OF THE FAMINE

SSIONARY Maurice J. Walker, in a letter from Chinkiang, gives these details of the illness and death of E. Williams, nber of THE TIAN HERALD he Relief Mis- ny Committee, terally "died post of duty":

Being his friend in China, fe at once sent e, and leaving sy deck of the swarming bustle and life, ushered into the ce of death. The morning we laid dy to rest within feet of the grave late Hudson dward Williams myself were s long ago, when were in business ndon. He was a of Lincolnshire, tudied medicine Bartholomew's tal, London. His life left a deep ssion on many new him in his student days. He prayed that more laborers might be sent to heathen , and was led to offer himself; so he studied medicine. Being accepted by the China Inland Mission, he came to China in 1890. After working for seven years, he and his wife visited Australia and England. They traveled widely in China, visiting and ministering to sick and lonely ones, nursing and carefully tending them back to health and strength. Many who for various reasons could not leave their stations were visited by Dr. Williams, and these visits often meant days and weeks of wearisome traveling in carts, barrows, or boats. Two years ago he came again to Chinkiang to relieve Dr. Cox, who went home on furlough. When work was started here among the refugees, of whom we had some 30,000 or more from the famine districts, he became responsible for the medical work in our temporary buildings. Day after day he toiled and prayed among them. Hundreds were helped and many relieved, and lives were saved through his skill and patience. Thus for four months he lived a busy, strenuous life, working for all. We had already planned to close the dispensary, and the last patients were being treated. We little thought his work was soon to finish, but the famine fever had taken a firm grip on him, and after much suffering he passed peacefully away.

THE FLOWER OF NEW ROCHELLE

By ISABELLA MACFARLANE

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The period is that of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. The Edict gave the Protestants freedom of worship in parts of France. The de Bonnefoy family, Huguenots of La Rochelle, assemble to honor the grandmother's birthday. Among those present are Gabrielle, the daughter of David de Bonnefoy, and her lover, Louis Marquand, son of the Huguenot pastor, who has been in hiding from the king's officers. Soldiers suddenly appear and take possession of the house. Captain Girard is at once smitten with Gabrielle's beauty. Her father sends her to some relatives, while he makes preparations to get his family on board ship to escape to America. Pastor Marquand returns to his home disguised as a mendicant. Troopers come to arrest him, but take Louis, mistaking him for the pastor, as he had put on his father's cloak. He is taken to the galleys, but leaves a note on the fly-leaf of a psalm-book explaining his plight. Gabrielle remains with her aunt, Madame Bertrand, in the country. With her cousin Rosalie she attends the festival of the crowning of the Rosiere. While there, Captain Girard suddenly appears to pay court to her. Repulsed, he leaves. That evening David de Bonnefoy comes to tell Gabrielle what has happened to her lover. Her father leaves. Gabrielle takes long walks through the forest to be alone with her grief. Again Captain Girard comes, and this time asks her to marry him. Gabrielle tells him her heart belongs to Louis. The troops leave the de Bonnefoy house, and the family with the exception of Gabrielle escape to the ship. Gabrielle is secreted in a bale of linen, and sent in a cart to the seashore, where a boat is to meet her. She falls out, and the driver discovers he has had a Huguenot as a passenger. He runs to give the alarm. Gabrielle tries to escape, and is captured by a coast guard, who takes her to a convent. The nuns try to convert her. Late at night she wrenches the bars from her window and escapes to the shore. She finds a fisherman waiting with his boat. He rows her to the ship, and proves to be Captain Girard in disguise. He wishes to go with her, but she sends him back to his duty. He is arrested on his return and sent to the galleys. In the galleys he is placed next to Louis Marquand, and they become firm friends, not knowing they are rivals. They are transported as slaves to a West Indian island. After six months of servitude Girard receives news of his pardon.

LARGE barns and sheds offered a shelter to the four-footed part of the traveling public, and at the back of the Golden Horse Tavern an extensive poultry yard with a well-appointed hen-house was the pride of Mistress Van Dusen's heart; for no matter how large a party of travelers should swoop down on the hostelry, the poultry yard afforded an ever ready resource, and at short notice she could set before her guests the delicious broiled chicken or the savory (if indigestible) pot-pie, in addition to the ham and eggs that never failed.

The Golden Horse was a favorite stopping-place for farmers, drovers and teamsters of all descriptions, for they knew that its commodious stables furnished excellent accommodations for their tired and hungry beasts, and its warm kitchen and well-filled larder good entertainment for themselves.

The landlord was a bluff, good-humored man, strong in his likings and equally strong in his dislikes. He had a wife who, as above hinted, joined with him heart and hand in making the guests of the Golden Horse comfortable.

He had also a daughter, named Elisabeth, at this time in the prime and bloom of early womanhood. Being an attractive girl, she had of course many admirers. Among them was Philip Van Buskirk, a young farmer of the neighborhood, to whom, with her father's consent, Elisabeth was in due time affianced.

But, as all the world knows, "the course of true love never did run smooth," and that of Philip and Elisabeth was no exception to the rule. Wolfert Van Dusen unfortunately quarreled with the father of Philip about the price of a load of hay, and in his wrath against the father vowed that the son should not marry his daughter, forbidding her even to see or to speak with him. At the same time he urged the claims of another suitor whom he had all the while secretly preferred to Philip, because he was the son of a wealthier man.

Elisabeth submitted patiently to the decree of separation from her beloved, but refused with spirit to listen to the solicitations of his rival.

It was New Year's Eve.

There was snow on the ground, but there had been a slight thaw. All day a heavy rain had fallen, freezing as it fell, until every object exposed to it was covered with a thick coating of ice. A cheerless, dismal day.

Towards night, the rain had ceased, the clouds cleared away, a strong frost set in.

Pinkster Hill was one sheet of ice from top to bottom—a veritable mer de glace, and woe to the unhappy mortal whose fates led him either up or down its slippery sides, where the very dogs could scarcely keep their footing.

A huge fire of logs roared up the chimney of the Golden Horse, around which was seated a motley assembly, in every attitude which could indicate ease and comfort. Rough farmers from the adjacent towns; red-faced drovers from the north; Yankee peddlers from New England; tenants of the great Van Rensselaer Manor, nominal payers of rent, who had come to Albany at the New Year to hand over to their indulgent landlord, the Patroon, the half-dozen chickens and turkeys, the twenty bushels of rye or buckwheat, and the few pounds of sausage or head-cheese, which enabled them to hold and cultivate some of the richest farms on the banks of the Hudson.

These sat enjoying honest Wolfert's hospitality, while their tired horses munched their oats in the stable.

A little removed from the company sat Mistress Van Dusen, her fingers plying her knitting-needles. Near her was seated Elisabeth spinning flax—the low hum of her spinning-wheel, as her foot kept it constantly turning, forming a not unpleasing accompaniment to the conversation.

Many admiring glances were cast upon her by the younger portion of the company, but she heeded them not.

An attentive observer might have noticed something peculiar about her this evening. A restless, anxious expression sat upon her features; every sudden sound made her start, and although her fingers steadily twisted the flaxen threads, it was evident that her thoughts were not on her work. Ever and anon, as her father and his guests continued to talk, she glanced impatiently at the old clock that ticked in the corner—a quaintly carved and smoke-darkened piece of furniture that had come from Holland with the first settlers, and was a much prized heirloom in the Van Dusen family.

It was, indeed, waxing late. The "suppawn-bell" had long since rung. This was a peal rung out at precisely eight o'clock from the belfry of the old Dutch church which stood at the foot of Pinkster Hill, at its intersection with Market Street, to intimate to all good citizens that it was time to eat their supper of suppawn, or Indian meal porridge, and go to bed.

Some of the drovers and others had already slipped away to the dormitories provided for them, when, on a sudden, there arose a great clatter outside, of horses' feet and men's voices mingled with the pleasant tintinnabulation of sleigh bells.

The hostler caught up his lantern and hurried out. Mine host opened the door, and in marched a lady and gentleman clothed from head to foot in furs—David de Bonnefoy and his daughter.

"Good evening, Mr. Landlord. Can you furnish a couple of rooms for the night to my daughter and me?"

"That I can, sir; and a supper, too, I suppose?" questioningly.

"Yes. I think a hot supper would do us good. We were belated, having been hindered by the storm. And now the road is in such an icy condition that my driver says he would not dare make the attempt to descend this hill, as his horses are not sharp-shod."

Elisabeth left her spinning-wheel, and assisted Gabrielle to divest herself of her wraps, admiring as she did so the stately beauty of the French girl. Her mother set about getting supper, calling to her assistance a sleepy handmaid, while another was despatched to see that the rooms were in order.

The supper was soon smoking on the table. The travelers, after partaking of it, begged to be shown to their chambers, as they were very tired with their journey. Wolfert would fain have detained Mr. Bonnefoy, and engaged him in conversation, in the hope of gaining some news, but David refused to be interviewed.

What further occurred on this eventful evening must be reserved for another chapter.

CHAPTER XIX

A Surprise

WHEN all had left the kitchen, the landlord came and stood by his daughter, who had resumed her spinning.

He stood looking at her fondly and proudly. Notwithstanding her preoccupied manner, it was evident that she had bestowed more than ordinary care on her attire that evening, and the circumstance did not escape her father's notice.

"I like to see my girl dressed so neatly and looking so well. Did you expect a certain young man to-night, Elisabeth?"

"No," replied she, without looking up.

"I did, though. I wonder what has detained the boy."

"Perhaps," said she, coldly, "he has been drinking with some of his wild companions."

"Nay, now, Elisabeth, you wrong the boy. You first drive him away with your coldness, and then complain that he seeks other company."

"I do not complain. The man you speak of is nothing to me. Let him keep what company he pleases."

Wolfert stood for some time in silence, then resumed, in a tone of some severity: "'Tis time this state of things were ended. This young man makes you a good offer, and if you would not arouse your father's displeasure, you will accept it."

"Father," said Elisabeth, raising her head, and looking him calmly in the face, "I can not accept it. I love Philip. I have promised to be his wife, and if the other were made of gold, I would not marry him."

"Don't name Philip to me!" said her father angrily. "I hate the whole tribe of Van Buskirks. The 'other,' as you call him, is the man for me. But I shall leave him to plead his own cause. I cannot think why he came not up to-night, as he promised. Now put up your wheel, and get you to bed, and think well on what I have said."

With these words the landlord turned away, and having heaped some more wood on the fire, and carefully locked and bolted the doors, he retired to his chamber, whither Mistress Van Dusen had repaired some time before.

Elisabeth then put aside her wheel, and sat down before the fire, her arms me objected, on account of the t moonlight, the uncertain footing, and the crackling of the icy surface, which rendered the chances of detection much greater. But on the principle "the greater the danger the greater the honor," these objections were overruled, and the party, six in number, sallied forth, about "the very witching hour of night."

Reaching the place with some difficulty, and perceiving neither sound nor light (for the lovers had not dared to relight the lamp, lest the glare should attract attention), they entered the yard, and began the work of destruction.

Swiftly, silently, and with the skill of experience, each man seized his pair of fowls, and having wrung their necks, deposited them in a large corn-basket which they had brought for the purpose.

The whole operation occupied but a few minutes, and the young men exchanged whispered congratulations on the success of their raid, as the twelve fat, heavy fowls lay quivering in the basket.

They were in the act of emerging from the gate with their prize, when Philip Van Buskirk, armed with a huge stick, burst out upon them from the back door.

He attempted to shut the gate upon them, but with a dash and a bound the depredators flew past him before he could effect his purpose.

There was an empty wood-sleigh standing in front of the tavern, the owner of which, having been late in disposing of his load, and being a considerable distance from his home, had put up his team, and taken up his quarters for the night at the inn.

On to this sleigh the reckless youths flung their basket, and springing on themselves, with the quickness of thought started it down the hill. On—on it dashed with frightful velocity, the madbrained fellows clinging to the stakes and to each other.

But Philip was not to be so balked. He knew they must stop at the foot of the hill, and hastily pulling off his shoes that his thick woolen stockings might afford him a surer foot-hold on the icy surface, he started on the run down the hill.

When he reached the bottom of the steep and slippery declivity, he found the sleigh scattered in fragments about the walls of the old Dutch church, against which it had dashed with terrific violence. The fowls and the basket that had contained them were picturesquely dotted over the white ground, and the young fellows were in the act of picking themselves up, with sundry "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" and rubbing of knees and elbows—all save one, who, stunned by the fall, lay motionless on the snow.

Some of his companions shook him and attempted to raise him, while others made haste to pick up the chickens, but seeing Philip close at hand, with other persons who had been roused by the noise and had joined in the chase, the heroes made a virtue of necessity, and fled—leaving their wounded companion, the basket, and the poultry, as trophies in the hands of their pursuers.

They were all (that is, the trophies) conveyed up the hill to the Golden Horse by Philip and his assistants.

By this time the whole household, including the travelers, was up, and reassembled in the kitchen.

At the first loud, startling cry of the doomed chickens, Gabrielle had run into her father's room.

"Oh, father," she said, clinging to his arm, "what is it? Can it be an attack by the Indians?"

"Hardly, I think. That cry did not sound much like an Indian war-whoop."

"Women and Children First"

This is the universal rule among civilized people where danger is to be escaped. It is just as proper where the danger is not so apparent, though quite as real. Into every life some rain must fall. When it is certain that the existence of the home will some day be at stake, provision for the safety and comfort of the home folks is entitled to the right of way.

The Mutual Life Insurance Company is of the greatest help to the bread-winner who says "Women and children first." A policy in this great company means help for them and peace for him. CHINESE DOCTORS AND THEIR WAYS*

TO become a native physician a Chinaman states to his friends and neighbors, "I am a physician." This is the limit of required preparation. His diploma is the more or less handsome signboard which announces his determination to the neighborhood. It is a fine start for a man if his father was a physician before him; not, however, because of supposed inherited professional gifts, unless his father's prescribing manual be considered in this class; and as for a grandfather and two books of prescriptions, that is unspeakable riches, if not wisdom.

Drugs in common use are cockroaches, fossils, rhinoceros skin, shavings, silkworms, crude calomel, human secretions, rhubarb, asbestos, moths, oyster shells, maggots, centipedes, caterpillars, toads, lizards and cicada shells. Just why cicada shells should be the great nervous sedative of China it is not easy to see. It is true that their ideas of music are not the same as ours, but have you ever heard a chain-gang of cicadæ get really down to solid work on a hot summer night? And the shells are the weapons with which they do it all. In most of their animal drugs the Chinese are strictly homeopathic in aim, barring dosage, as when they give tiger's bones as a tonic in debility, because the tiger is a strong animal; but this cicada business seems to work on strictly allopathic lines.

As Dr. Williams says, "anything indeed that is thoroughly disgusting in the three kingdoms of nature is considered good for medicinal use," and the worst of it all is, they do not just take medicine as we do; they literally and truly "eat" it, so large is the size of the average dose. The word for this function in China is chuh, to eat. I have a Chinese pill, a tonic for the weak, and it measures an inch across and weighs half an ounce. Here are smaller ones for bronchitis. The dose is about one hundred and fifty pills. Here is the dragon-festival powder, of which the average dose is two tablespoonfuls to a man, at the feast, to keep off the evil spirits, which are of course considered a distinct disease by the Chinese.

The day of argument for medical missions is in truth past and gone, and those who do not believe in them simply do not know. Yet, in the comparison of these medical methods, the old and the new, every reasonable man must surely find good ground for the renewing of his faith. There is in it no appeal to the emotions. Yet, if I could, I would take you men into the wards of St. Luke's hospital for a time. Every little while there comes into the hospital a man with, let us say, cataract. He is blind, has been blind for from five to twenty years, and there is no more agonizing blindness than that of the man who used to see. He is admitted, and after due preparation, under cocaine and by means of the most delicate and beautiful operation in all surgery, we remove the cataract. Within the space of ten minutes he looks up into our faces and says, "T'ong-ka, ngoo k'oen tuh kyien kuh!" (Master, I can see.) And a month later he is sitting in our office reading the newspaper. This is a matter of the emotions, but there lies in these common incidents of hospital life a warrant for medical missions in the white light of which all fine financial calculations and every scientific discussion inevitably shrivel up, as mere words in the presence of works, as dead things give place to the living. There waits in China to-day an army of 100,000 blind, perfectly curable men, women and children, and there they remain, day by day, year by year, in their unending night, waiting, waiting, waiting.

And bound up in this question is that larger one, yet like it. Is it worth while to present our faith to the Chinese people? Again it is a question of what we think of it, of our faith. Is our great Ideal of human life worth giving to the Chinese? Each must settle that question for himself. The church, of course, has taken her stand. It will take longer than to give them scientific medicine, but then the goal is in the stars. It has taken 1,600 years to make England half Christian, and it may take as long in China, but even so, when we call to mind many a Christian home in China, and compare it with its heathen neighbor, when we compare the worship of the joss house with the worship of the Holy Trinity, when we but think of the character of Jesus Christ, even the man, we missionaries have no doubt that it is unspeakably worth while, as worth while as the work of St. Paul in Rome, of Augustine in England, as worth while as anything in the world that a man can give his life to. But you say we missionaries are enthusiasts. Well, so be it! I, for one, plead guilty. But I tell you, that down on the bed rock, it is not a question of enthusiasm; it is a question of what each in his heart really thinks about the man Christ Jesus.

The Story of Hawaii

Mr. Ernest F. Acheson, a correspondent of the Washington, Pa., Observer, accompanied the Congressional party which visited Hawaii recently on the transport Buford. Mr. Acheson wrote to his paper a series of very interesting letters relating to the visit, and these are now published in illustrated souvenir form. These letters in reality constitute a complete history of Hawaiian progress and development, from the earliest days until now, and they include a well-written description of some of the more remarkable natural wonders and scenic attractions of that mid-Pacific volcanic group. Incidentally Mr. Acheson refers to the fact that the Buford, when it went to Honolulu, had on board THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S cargo of flour for Chinese famine relief.

Books Received

In The Stranger, J. F. Caldwell tells the story of a young Northern girl whom necessity sent to become a school-teacher in the South during the throes of the Reconstruction period. The refined and delicate nature of the young girl was almost crushed by the social prejudices which she encountered, but the innate nobility of a true Southern woman came to the rescue, and the sweet little "Yankee school ma'am" came into her own. The Neale Publishing Co. Pp. 520. Price $1.50.

The Birth of the Nation, Mrs. Roger A. Pryor's latest contribution to American literature, is a timely book for the hour, beginning as it does with the English settlement at Jamestown. The book covers the leading facts of colonial history in an easy, colloquial fashion, introducing occasional bits of romantic folk-lore which make it the more readable to the unaccustomed reader. Mrs. Pryor's story of our beginnings is a boon to young people who "want to know," and to their elders who have no love for ponderous historical tomes. Macmillan & Co., New York. Illustrated. Pp 352. Price $1.75.

A valuable addition to the Sunday School, the Women's Foreign Missionary Society and the Missionary Campaign Traveling Libraries is contained in Our Moslem Sisters, a series of papers written by missionaries in the various lands under Mohammedan rule. The united chapters are edited by Annie Van Sommer and Samuel M. Zwerner, and comprise a comprehensive exposition of the lives of the women of Egypt, Tunis, Algiers, Morocco, East Africa, Arabia, Syria, Turkey, etc. The whole book is indeed "a cry of need from lands of darkness, interpreted by those who heard it." Fleming H. Revell Company, New York and Chicago. Illustrated. Pp. 299. Price $1.25.

In The Law and the Letter, by Mary Polk Winn and Margaret Hannis, life as it was lived in the early days of the province of Louisiana is fascinatingly delineated. The world-old problem of the mixture of races is delicately but convincingly handled. A beautiful girl, reared with every advantage which wealth and culture can give, beloved by a young aristocrat, is found to have the taint of mixed blood. At the altar she is separated from her lover by the law of the province, and all hope of earthly happiness gone, she seeks peace within a convent. An absorbing tale for the summer vacation, full of local color. The Neale Publishing Company. Pp. 184. Price $1.25.

"GOD BLESS YOU, DEAR!"

IN all the varied realm of thought,
Expressed in language sweet and clear,
No whispered word to me has brought
A warmer glow of love and cheer
Than this: "God bless you, dear!"

"God bless you, dear!" God who upholds
The universe by word of power,
Whose spirit all our lives enfolds,
Whose mercy rules each passing hour—
"God bless you, dear!"

"God bless you, dear!" There's not a trace
Of any good beneath the skies
Outside the bonds of that embrace
Whatever be its present guise:
"God bless you, dear!"

"God bless you, dear!" And does he pause
To note each child upon his way?
My heart makes answer: "Yes, because He loves us both;" and so I pray,
"God bless you, dear!"

Outlaws Won by the Gospel

WE thank THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the donors for the money so kindly sent to aid our work in the Philippine Islands. We are hoping to be able to purchase a launch. Even without a missionary launch the Gospel has been spread wonderfully and quickly in the island of Cebu and other surrounding islands.

These mountains were the hiding-place of the revolutionary robbers up to the early months of the present year, when the last band surrendered, seeking protection in a Protestant village. Like hundreds of others, these robbers were convinced through the teachings of the Gospel, which they had seen lived out in the lives of the converts. By the teaching of the books which had reached them, they learned that there was a better and happier way for them to live. Many of the workers who travel over the mountains to-day from coast to coast, bringing the Gospel of glad tidings and peace for their people, were formerly revolutionists.

During the five years' missionary work in these southern islands, the evangelistic missionary and his native helpers have traveled these mountains unarmed. For the sake of the Gospel they taught, their lives were protected by the rough outlaws. Twenty-eight congregations have been formed and cared for in this way. Over a thousand trained converts are now bringing about a great change for the better in the island of Cebu alone. One large island sent twenty-four deputations from its people pleading for the Gospel before it could be sent them from Cebu; now a native evangelist is stationed there to meet the need of thousands.

This first gift from America toward the Gospel launch is welcomed as coming through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through whose work two native Bible women have already received support in Cebu.

The Kaiser's "Four Virtues"

THERE is no end to the Kaiser's versatility. In conjunction with Professor Walter Schott and three other Berlin sculptors (a Berlin correspondent writes), the emperor has designed four statues, which are to be placed in front of the chapel of the crypt of the new Berlin Cathedral, and are to represent the four virtues which, in the Kaiser's opinion, should most adorn and dignify a ruler. The statues are to be of bronze, and will be placed on pedestals of Carrara marble. With their pedestals each will be about twenty-five feet high, and they will stand two on each side of the entrance to the chapel.

The first of the statues is finished and represents Courage, the greatest of kingly virtues. Courage is symbolized by a knight in armor, with a mantle falling in copious folds from a steel collar. In his hand he holds a lance with streaming ribbons. The other three virtues which will be represented are Wisdom, Justice, and Moderation.

The Kaiser is said to have objected to the representation of Justice by a conventional female figure, accompanying his objection by the rather ungallant remark that "Justice is pre-eminently a masculine quality." M. B. C.

CHANGE FOOD

And Lose That Uneasy Feeling

A man who has always been a "sickly chap," although hardly ever ill, tells of the way he put on flesh and reduced his irritable and nervous condition.

By chance he had a taste of Grape-Nuts food at the table of a friend and enjoyed the flavor so much that he began to have it every meal. He says:

"In a short time I found myself another person; the old feeling of discontent and uneasiness left me entirely; it became a pleasure to go about my work, whereas before, for years, I had always had the feeling of being a little weary; but now I seem to have a surplus of energy for everything; my weight has increased 11 pounds in four weeks, and am still gaining.

"I have never been very sick and am satisfied, if my present improvement in health continues, I shall not be.

"The change that this food has made in my life has been remarkable, and so satisfactory that I am glad of the opportunity to tell you. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

THE GLORY OF OLD AGE

THE First Methodist Church of Mount Vernon, N. Y., recently devoted its morning service to honoring the one hundredth birthday of one of the oldest members in active service in the Methodist body or perhaps in the whole Church. The pastor preached a sermon on "The Glories of Old Age," showing that the Bible does not teach that man reaches the "dead line" at sixty, but rather that the normal old age there is glory and to the aged Christian comes everlasting youth.

Mrs. Rheua Webb Miller was the recipient of the honors of the day, appearing in the best of health and spirits, undaunted by weight of years and pleased that she is a centenarian. For over eighty years she has been an active Christian and a church member. In her hundred years she has seen more of progress than Methusaleh could have seen in his whole nine hundred years. She saw the beginnings of the steam engine, steamboat, telephone, telegraph, phonograph, electric car and electric light, and she maintains an interest in them all. Her day slavery was abolished, and public education and missions were born. Her life has spanned the coming and going of every President of the United States save two—Washington and Adams. She was born on April 12, 1807, at Stamford, Conn.

Mrs. Rheua Webb Miller

Her father, Col. Seth Webb, was a Revolutionary soldier. She is still an active member of the Mellicent Porter Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution of Waterbury, Conn.

Few women ever live to see a great-great-grandchild born, but such has been her fortune. She has twenty-eight great-grandchildren, twenty-one grandchildren, and was the mother of twelve children. The following are still living: D. Webster Miller, James H. Miller, Mrs. J. U. Beauchelle, Mrs. S. G. Vredenburg, Mrs. C. W. Hicks and J. F. Miller. About sixty of these descendants gathered to celebrate her centennial. "The Grand Old Lady of Mount Vernon" was the name then conferred upon her.

She married the Rev. William Miller, who preached until 1847, when he became a justice of the peace and then a Supreme Court Justice. She has been a widow for over forty years. Some interviewer lately called on her just as she was singing her favorite hymn:

When I can read my title clear
To mansions in the skies.

A smile of faith and joy lingered upon her face that made it look almost "one hundred years young."

Until she was ninety-five years of age it was her custom to walk twice a day to church, but now she has to be taken in a carriage.

ALABAMA STIRRED BY A REVIVAL

ALABAMA has been visited, during the spring and summer, by a very remarkable wave of revival. Beginning in April or May, Rev. Bob Jones, who had just returned from a winter campaign in Texas, held meetings in rapid succession in various towns in Alabama. He stopped recently for a few days of rest in the North. These meetings have been so intensive in influence, that the saloons and dispensaries have been closed in whole counties; and the Legislature of Alabama, which in the latter part of July repealed the "anti-shipping" law to the local option law passed a few weeks before, did so largely through the influences started by these meetings in various cities in the State.

In ten of these cities, more than a thousand persons were added to the church membership; and perhaps twice as many publicly acknowledged that they had found Christ. The last meeting of the series was held the other day in Camden: in a town of not more than two thousand people, the additions to the church were more than a hundred.

In Dothan, with a population of six thousand, fifteen hundred men assembled in the Methodist church on a hot Sunday afternoon to hear Mr. Jones preach to men. Almost every man in the house shook the preacher's hand in pledge to live a clean Christian life. About ninety per cent. signed a petition to the city council to close the dispensary or municipal monopoly saloon. It was the oldest dispensary in Alabama, having been established in 1896, when it displaced seven bar-rooms. The dispensary sales amounted to $90,000 a year. In less than three days after that Monday meeting, the dispensary was closed by law. In the same city, hundreds of people were converted, among them a brother of the evangelist.

Rev. Robert Jones is twenty-three years old, and was reared in Southeast Alabama. He has been preaching since he was fifteen years of age. He spent two years in college at the Methodist Conference College at Greensboro, Ala., but did not complete his education. He is a simple, direct preacher of remarkable power, and has been so, but not in so great a degree, from his boyhood. He has spent only three years exclusively in evangelistic work. His future promises much to the Church.

Answered Prayers

J. M. W., Connecticut. "The Lord has given me the desire of my heart, and I know it was in answer to prayer."

L. A. S., Ohio. "God has recently heard and answered my prayer beyond a doubt. Praise his name!"

B. E. S., New York. "God has answered a prayer for me that means more to me than anything else in this life."

Reader, New York City. "I desire to express my thanks to my Heavenly Father for his goodness in answering prayer."

Pennsylvania Subscriber. "I desire to publicly express my thanks to a loving Father for prayers answered."

Mrs. W. G., Brookbank, North Dakota. "Many times I have had answers to prayers. I feel it is the only place when in trouble or sorrow to go to for comfort."

M. E. F., New York. "I know God answers the prayers of his children, for I have tried him many times. Some time ago he answered one with especial blessings."

Mrs. J. A. B., California. "I was greatly troubled about my little son. I prayed earnestly, and the dear Lord heard and answered my prayer, for which I am very thankful, and give him the glory."

W. D. M., New Jersey. "God has answered many prayers for me. When we ask for God's will to be done, we shall surely profit: for God's will is almighty, and so we should never doubt, but trust and pray."

Mrs. J. H. D., Missouri. "I have obtained so much help from the testimony of believers expressed in the columns of The Christian Herald, that I feel it my duty to testify. To me, there is nothing so plainly taught in God's Word as prayer. This is a great privilege he has given, a great power he has granted us."

Young Girl, New York. "A short time ago I was in trouble; but I took it to the Lord in prayer, promising him that if he would relieve me, I would acknowledge it publicly. The answer came quickly."

F. A. B., Pennsylvania. "The Answered Prayer column has been a great inspiration to me. I can testify to a great many answered prayers. Something has been granted for which I have been praying a long time, but in a different way than I expected. I am trusting God for the rest."

REX FLINTKOTE
ROOFING
Can Be Laid Single-handed

The clean quiet easy way of laying Rex Roofing is in strong contrast to the smoke and smell and muss of putting on a tar and gravel roof or to the clatter and bang of laying tin—and the contrast is further emphasized in the bills for labor. When the cost of one ordinary workman's time is compared with that of the crew of skilled mechanics necessary to lay other kinds, Rex is the easiest roofing to lay, and the best roof after it is laid.

FOUND OUT

A Trained Nurse Made Discovery.

No one is in a better position to know the value of food and drink than a trained nurse.

Speaking of coffee, a nurse of Wilkes Barre, Pa., writes: "I used to drink strong coffee myself, and suffered greatly from headaches and indigestion. While on a visit to my brothers I had a good chance to try Postum Food Coffee, for they drank it altogether in place of ordinary coffee. In two weeks after using Postum I found I was much benefited, and finally my headaches disappeared and also the indigestion.

"Naturally, I have since used Postum among my patients, and have noticed a marked benefit where coffee has been left off and Postum used.

"I observed a curious fact about Postum when used among mothers. It greatly helps the flow of milk in cases where coffee is inclined to dry it up, and where tea causes nervousness.

"I find trouble in getting servants to make Postum properly. They most always serve it before it has been boiled long enough. It should be boiled 15 to 20 minutes after boiling begins and served with cream, when it is certainly a delicious beverage." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

READ HER BIBLE 76 TIMES

"AUNTY" ABBIE L. WILLIAMS began reading the Bible at the age of fourteen, and has read it at the rate of three chapters a day and five on Sundays each year up to the present time. Mrs. Williams is now ninety-three years of age, and on account of infirmity is no longer able to continue her Scripture readings unassisted; but she still delights in God's Word and has it read to her, and finds in its promises daily bread as manna from heaven.

She was the daughter of Hon. Phineas White of Putney, Vt., Congressman from that State. She became a Christian when a little girl. She married the Rev. William H. Williams of Tuscaloosa, Ala., a descendant of Ephraim Williams, founder of Williams College. "Aunt Abbie" was the mother of eleven children, two of whom became ministers of the Gospel. All her children were brought up to revere the Scriptures, and all received the blessings that come from such teachings. It is possible that among THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers Mrs. Williams may hold the record for reading the whole Bible entirely through, from the first of Genesis to the last of Revelation, no less than seventy-six times.

Mrs. Abbie L. Williams

FLORIDA'S PRISON CHAPLAIN

A STRANGE post, full of hard work and with few encouragements, is that of chaplain of Florida's convict camps. This post for a number of years past has been ably filled by Rev. James C. Teter, whose duty it is to visit and preach the Gospel at the prison camps of the State and furnish the prisoners with proper literature. In all, Chaplain Teter has the spiritual care of some nine camps. These are situated long distances apart, and necessitate constant hard traveling. Yet never has the chaplain failed to arrive at the stipulated time with the Gospel message, and he is always sure of a cordial welcome from the prisoners. As he travels at his own expense, it might be supposed that the State of Florida made suitable provision for the worker among the unfortunates; yet all that the chaplain receives is the meagre allowance of $6.25 per quarter for each camp. This, it is admitted even by the State officials, is wholly inadequate, and the worker is frequently compelled to use some of his own slender resources to meet the charges for work for which the State should make provision.
